The young lady is twenty-six years of age, and is a native of Salem, Mass. Her position on the other side will give her full scope for the talent and tact she is said to possess. Social success counts for a great deal in English politics, and if she can make the Chamberlain receptions attractive, she will give social prestige to a party sadly in need of prestige of some kind. Her husband and Lord Hartington are the leaders of the party which we, in this country, would call "mugwumps," and, as Lord Hartington is unmarried, the social side of the party will be under Mrs. Chamberlain's management. Like the Mugwumps here, Mr. Chamberlain and his friends are not loved by the party they have left, nor the party they are now aiding. The Liberals charge upon them their long exclusion from office, and the Tories are opposed to them on every political principle except the one of refusing Home Rule to Ireland. In this uncomfortable position the influence of a charming American lady may perhaps have a helpful influence.

Though it is impossible to foresee the issue of the present curious political situation in England, it is by no means improbable that the young lady, as Mrs. Chamberlain, may yet see as much of official life in the land of her adoption as she has seen, as Miss Endicott, in the land of her birth. Mr. Chamberlain has boundless ambition and no little ability. Until he deserted Mr. Gladstone, he was regarded as the natural successor of that statesman; Lord Hartington, who would occupy that position, will have to quit the House of Commons for the House of Lords whenever the Duke of Devonshire, his aged father, dies. At present the Liberal party would not accept Mr. Chamberlain as its leader, if Mr. Gladstone should die; but if a reconciliation can be effected between the Liberals and Mugwumps, it is safe to predict that Mr. Chamberlain would hold high office in the Government.

This is the third time that Mr. Chamberlain has been married. After the death of his first wife, he married her cousin, only to be a second time bereaved. In both instances his grief was so intense that he had to retire for a time from public life. He is fifty-two years of age and is very wealthy. His fortune is derived from a partnership in the firm of Nettlefold & Chamberlain, screwmakers, which he inherited from his father. It may be hoped that this and the other social ties of the same kind between the prominent families in the two countries may serve to draw the two nations into more friendly relations, and that the prejudice fomented during the recent campaign may be allayed. Mrs. Chamberlain, for her part, will have no difficulty in inspiring her husband with a friendly feeling toward the United States, as he is already an ardent admirer of a Republican form of government, and has incurred some odium in his own land by publicly averring that royalty is an expensive and useless encumbrance with which Great Britain might advantageously dispense.

A WIFE LENT TO THE MISSIONARIES.

In a letter from Dr. Elizabeth Reifsnyder, who is laboring as a medical missionary in China, to the Missionary Link, she mentions the valuable assistance she receives in her work from a girl whose husband has been induced to lend her to the Christian ladies. She says: "There came to the hospital a young girl of sixteen years, upon whose face and neck we operated. The result was most satisfactory. As soon as this girl was able to be about, she became most helpful, and our good matron said if she could have her for help, she would much prefer her to an older person, since she was willing, young, quick in her movements, and most kind to the patients. The girl remained with us several months, no one coming to see her, or inquire after her, and finally we concluded to see what could be done for her. She was engaged to be married, but had no relatives whatever. It seems she was secured for a daughter-in-law when quite small, for the sum of thirty dollars. Finding her so bright, useful, and anxious to remain with us, we called the husband, and asked him if he would agree to her remaining two years with us. She would go to our school in the morning, help in the Dispensary in the afternoons, and assist in the wards early in the mornings and nights, being taught at the same time to sew and be useful. He agreed, and we have her with us, a bright, helpful girl."

A PERSIAN ROBE OF HONOR.

A letter from Dr. G. W. Holmes, who is laboring as a medical missionary at Tabriz, which is published in the Church, shows that the Oriental custom mentioned in Esther (6:10) and other parts of Scripture, of clothing favored subjects with robes of honor, still exists, and it has recently been conferred on a Christian missionary. It seems that Dr. Holmes, after some hesitation, has accepted the position offered him as physician-in-chief to the heir-apparent to the Persian throne. The Crown Prince had requested that he should delay his departure for America, and in the meantime the Ameer, the Governor-General, who is spoken of as able and powerful, was supposed to be fatally sick, and Dr. Holmes was called to take the entire charge of the case. To the surprise of all the Ameer recovered. Subsequently the infant daughter of the Crown Prince was restored to health, the case being put in charge of the same physician. Dr. Holmes received public thanks and a robe of honor. In his present position there are no restrictions upon his engaging in Christian work. Already he has had frequent and earnest discussions with the Crown Prince upon the comparative claims of Christianity and Islam, and the gospel has been faithfully presented to the Prince. Another happy circumstance is the desire of the Governor-General that his household shall receive instruction from the ladies of the mission in various feminine accomplishments, his carriage being sent regularly for the teachers. Aside from the direct influence which these missionaries may exert, it will be made clear in the eyes of all that they are not to be regarded with suspicion. Their motives and aims will be so understood that the prejudice against them must yield.

AN INEBRIATE UNDER TREATMENT.

How thoroughly the principle of Divine Healing enters into every difficulty in life, when it is once adopted, is seen in a letter from the Transvaal, in Africa, which Mrs. M. Baxter publishes in this month's Thy Healer.* It appears that there are five families there, who have all taken Christ as their Healer, and go to Him in all their sickness. A. Rosher, the head of one of these families, writing to Mrs. Baxter, says: "About two weeks ago we prayed in faith for a brother sinner, who came into a large inheritance from his father, who died about a year ago, and left him and an only sister about 50,000 shares in the best gold properties. This worldly-lucky man is, or was, so addicted to drink that he lost all self-respect (he was from a highly respected English family). Well, he chose to place himself under me, to bring him off the drink, not expecting such treatment as he received. First night I allowed him his own way with his bottle of whiskey, and prayed for him. The next evening was an appointed meeting night, when five of us laid on hands, and each successively prayed—prayed God to take away the craving and save him from drink and from sin, and make him a useful member of society. We prayed the prayer of faith, believing we were heard. The next day, after noon, he left my house, still with the craving for drink; but now all is over, and he is released from the craving, hating himself for his misconduct."

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. A PREACHER CONFUSED.

An incident published by Dr. Charles Cullis in his Times of Refreshing shows how God uses the apparent failures of His servants for His own wise purposes. A clergyman, in the course of his reminiscences, says: "One Sunday morning I preached to a crowded congregation, chiefly composed of the principal inhabitants of the neighborhood. I was just engaged in giving my audience a picturesque description of a sunset on the Sea of Galilee, when all of a sudden, owing to the close atmosphere, a little girl fell into a fainting fit. The disturbance which it created, though only short and comparatively insignificant, yet so much put me out that I became altogether confused. The rest of my sermon all at once vanished from my memory. I could not recollect one word of it. In my perplexity I cried to God for help. While looking down on my Bible, which was lying open before me, my eye fell upon the words 'all flesh is as grass,' etc. (1 Pet. 1: 24, 25.) Yielding as it were to an instinctive impulse, I read it to my hearers, and began preaching from it an improvised sermon, just as it came up in my heart. And here, having lost my oratorical flower-basket, I could not help laying bare the truths of God's word in all their simplicity and startling reality. Connecting the text with my previous description, I called the glory of man a setting sun, but which was never to rise again. I spoke of the utter vanity of everything human, of the certainty of the destruction of this world, and of our everlasting condemnation if we were to die in the midst of our sins.

"Walking home with my wife, after the service, I was in a desponding mood and quite ashamed of myself, 'for the people must have noticed my confusion,' I said; 'and what a gossip will it be all over the place that the minister broke down in the middle of his sermon!

"We had scarcely got home, however, when a lady desired to speak to me. The impression which her appearance made upon me was not very agreeable. She was gaudily dressed, and carried a flourish of trinkets, lace, and finery which created a most unfavorable impression.

"'Sir,' she said, while her lip quivered, 'could you permit me to speak to you in confidence?'

"'Certainly, ma'am.'

"'I am a lost woman,' she said, while tears burst from her eyes; 'but you, sir, can perhaps tell me whether there is still salvation for me who have so long lived a careless life.'

"She then briefly told me her history. She was a person held in high esteem in the society in which she moved. But she was living without God and without Christ in the world, and was entirely given up to pleasure and love of dress and display. Church she seldom or never visited. The places which she frequented were the theatre and the ball-room. But on this Sunday morning, having gone out for a walk, her attention was struck by the singing which reached her ears from my church. The thought occurred to her that she might as well step in and sit down among the congregation. But here she found she had come just in time to learn what the glory of man was. My sermon went like a two-edged sword through her heart. She saw that with all her beauty, she was but a withering flower, dead, lost, helpless, and hopeless. And she now besought me to tell her more about that Saviour whom I had spoken of as the only one who was able to save from ruin.

"I need not tell you," the minister continues, "how gladly I told her of Christ. Her eyes were opened to the glory of His sin-atoning love as well as to the beauty of His holiness. It was not long before she became a Christian."

A WEEPING SUPPLIANT IN A CHURCH.

A few weeks ago a young lady entered an Episcopal church in New York, in the evening, and knelt in prayer. She soon lost consciousness of her surroundings, and became absorbed in communion with God. Evidently she was in trouble, for her tears began to flow freely, and occasionally a stifled sob shook her frame. No one noticed her except an elderly lady, who, passing near her, observed her emotion, and, with true Christian sympathy, was moved to learn the cause of her suffering. Presently the girl rose from her knees, and was about to leave the building, when the aged lady accosted her. Gentle words and a manner of kind friendliness drew the girl's story from her.

It appeared that she was a pious English girl, who, years ago, in her own land, was well educated by her Christian mother. The girl lived near to Christ, and ardently longed to spend her life in His service. The claims of the unconverted lay heavily upon her heart, and she determined to give herself to the work of God among the poor. The mother sympathized with her desire, and sent her to be trained for the field of labor. Shortly afterward, however, the mother's health failed, and the daughter, recognizing the call of God to home duty, gave up for the time the preparation for her chosen work, and went home to nurse her mother. The malady was a long and trying one. For eleven years the girl waited upon the invalid, attending to her wants and fulfilling a daughter's duties with filial affection. At last death removed the mother, and the girl was left alone in the world. Peculiar circumstances brought her to America, and three years ago she landed in New York.

Her first effort was to obtain work of a missionary kind in the city. But she was friendless and unknown, and, her small stock of money rapidly dwindling, she was soon brought to the point when neither her ardent longing for distinctively religious work nor her educational accomplishments could stand in the way of her accepting menial employment, which was the only employment she could obtain. She went into domestic service, and soon became a valued household help. Her opportunities for recreation were few and short. In one of them she went to the Young Women's Christian Association, where she was treated kindly, but where, just then, there were no openings for giving her the kind of work she was longing for. The poor girl grieved sadly, most of all because her hope of spending her life in Christ's service seemed doomed to disappointment. Her distress on the night when she entered the church was almost too great for her to bear, and she sought peace and support in the way God has appointed. Her new acquaintance encouraged and cheered her, exhorting her to keep fast her faith in God, trusting Him to open the way to usefulness.

Two days later the girl received a letter, bidding her go to the Young Women's Christian Association, where news of importance was awaiting her. She went. The news was, that the people of Grace Church were about opening a mission in a neglected part of the city, and needed some earnest, devoted Christian lady, of education, kindness, and tact, to take charge of it. She would be expected to look after the women of the neighborhood, hold mothers' meetings, and in various ways help her poor sisters to realize that in the religion of Jesus was the secret of a happy, useful life. The girl's aged acquaintance in the church had happened to hear of this opening casually, while conversing with a Christian friend on the very next day after her interview with the girl in the church, and at once recommended her, feeling sure that God had thus provided an answer to that tearful prayer. The girl was at once engaged, and she is now happy and wonderfully successful in congenial Christian work.

THE RESURRECTION: THE FIRST.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard, Kan.

The second drama is the Resurrection scene and vision: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment," krima, "was given unto them." . . . Here we meet with new things, and with new actors; and, most singularly, with actors of whom it is said "that they lived and reigned with Christ the thousand years," and are marked out as the first-fruits of the great Resurrection army, and the Spirit of God pronounces it, "This is the first Resurrection." The first rising again, "The upstanding, the first." (Dr. R. Young.)

What means this Resurrection scene? We answer: After grave reflection, since long time, we have come to the conclusion that it means a real and a new upstanding of arisen bodies out of the grave, and a re-appearing of blessed spirits, or souls, formerly separated from but now again united with their own bodies, raised from the dust, visiting the scenes of their former earthly careers, now elevated to the highest offices of being priests of God and of Christ, and reigning with Him a thousand years, and, as the Greek has it, "reigning as kings." And to prove our statement, we adduce and offer the following facts:

1. Because, that if this vision must be spiritualized, then we have to acknowledge "a Hierarchy" in the church, and we ought to follow the example given by the Vatican, to have Cardinals and ecclesiastical princes in the Church of Christ.

2. Because we maintain that the objection which is commonly made that this is spoken of "souls" and not of "persons," seems to us a more convincing argument than anything else. It constates the fact that this Hebraism, "souls" taking the best part of man for the whole man, is a proof of the genuineness of this part of the Bible, and that it is a Jewish production which connects the Old Testament with the New Testament, and with the Revelation of Jesus Christ as one unit. Let us pay due attention, that we find the same word "souls" meaning living beings, persons, in the O. T. in Gen. 12: 4; Exod. 12: 4, and in thirty different places, and in the N. T. in Acts. 7: 14; 27: 37; Rev. 18: 13, and in many other places: In Acts 27: 37 is said: "And we were in all in the ship two hundred three score and sixteen souls. . . . And so it came to pass that they escaped all safe to land," and in 1 Peter 3: 20: "While the ark was in preparing wherein few, that is eight souls, were saved by water."

3. Because the souls mentioned as constituting the rising resurrection are put in opposition to others, who are called that word "loipos" signifying the remaining of the dead ones, makes them, as having been once one whole, and now being only a remnant which was not allowed yet, to rise to such a high distinction or state as those who had arisen from the dead.

4. Because it is a prerogative of the saints in their glorified state to be judges. In 1 Cor. 6: 2 the apostle declares: "Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world. Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" This judging does not mean that the saints shall be only counsellors; it means the very act of judging and condemning. Evil and Satan cannot be reformed, neither can innate evil be removed by gentle advice or counsel. That stage shall then have been passed, evil must be rebuked, and Satan must be put down (1 Cor. 15: 24), and that shall be "the great honor which the saints shall have" in the Millennial age. (Ps. 149: 9.)

In conclusion, it is the promise which the Lord Jesus did promise to the Church of Thyatira (Rev. 2: 26, 27): "And he that overcometh and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron"; that rule, being a part of the glory of the resurrected saints, is vouchsafed to them: "They must rule with Christ on the earth," and how can it be otherwise? The redeemed must be reinstated in all the prerogatives, and in higher privileges than ever Adam did possess. The redeemed arisen saints bearing the image of the Son of God (Rom. 8: 29; 1 Cor. 15: 40), must have and over the lower animal creation (Gen. 1: 28), and the words (Ps. 8: 5, Heb. 2: 7: 10), must be fulfilled. Man, who was made a little lower than Elohim, "Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor."

Indeed the doxology will be chanted during the ages to come (Rev. 5: 9–10). "Thou hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood, out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." "Blessing and honor and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever." Amen.

THE LORD'S RETURN IMMINENT.

By L. W. Munhall, M. D.*

Difference Between Two Schools of Prophetic Students—The Lord's Command—Passages Explicable Only in One Way—An Injunction Useless on any Other Ground—Errors Foreseen—A Duty Enjoined.

THE word Millennium is of Latin derivation. Mille, a thousand, and annus, a year. It is applied to the one thousand years mentioned in Rev., 20th chapter, during which Satan is bound in the bottomless pit, and righteousness and peace will prevail throughout the earth. The pre-millennialist believes that Christ will come before this period; the post-millennialists believe He will come after.

during the time of her Lord's absence. The parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25: 1–13) indicates, very clearly, that she should believe His return to be imminent. Is not the bride taught to have her lamps trimmed and burning, and commanded to "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." In Luke 12: 35–40 we find the following: "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when He will return from the wedding, that when He cometh and knocketh, they may open unto Him immediately. Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when He cometh, shall find watching . . . . And if He shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find them so, blessed are those servants. And this know, that if the good man of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken through. Be ye therefore ready also, for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not."

In Mark 13: 34–37 we find the case put in this fashion: "For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch;

Watch Ye Therefore

(for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning), lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all. Watch!" In Matt. 24: 42, 44 we find the case thus stated: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. . . . . Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." In 1 Thes. 5: 6—"Therefore let us not sleep, as do others, but let us watch and be sober."

What is the significance of these Scriptures if it is not that the Lord may come at any moment? The Lord said we "know neither the day nor hour." If the millennium were to begin to-day, I would know it, and I would then know the Lord will be here one thousand years hence. Is it possible that the thrilling and appalling events mentioned in Rev. 20: 1–4, as introductory to the millennium, could transpire without our knowledge of it? I trow not. If the post-millennialists are right, then I know the Lord will not come for more than a thousand years yet, and consequently not in my day. How could I be induced to watch for an event that I know will not take place in my time? What sense would there be in telling me to watch, as the Word of God does over and over again, for an event that I know is more than one thousand years in the future? God does not thus treat His children.

Our post-millennial brethren seek to turn

The Force of this Injunction to watch, so often repeated, by saying, "Have not more than eighteen hundred years rolled by since the Lord spake these words? and yet He has not come." This is tantamount to saying that His word of promise is not good, because of His delay; or, that it was necessary for Him to return immediately, in order that His promise, "I will come again," might be good. If the lapse of eighteen hundred years invalidates the promise, why not eighteen days? No: the lapse of eighteen hundred years, nor eighteen million centuries, would not make it impossible that the Lord may come at any moment. The promise is sure, and the passing of these eighteen centuries has only brought us so much nearer the glorious event. With the Father are the times and the seasons; and "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." (II Peter 3: 8.) The Lord knew what some would say on this point, and so He speaks these words, that they do well to prayerfully contemplate:

"But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth His coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." (Matt. 24: 48.)

"Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." (II Peter 3: 3, 4.)

A post-millennial friend of mine once said to me: "You are watching for the Lord's return. I am not. You will be disappointed. I will not be, because He will not come in our day." I replied: There is another point at which we differ; viz., I am doing just what God commands us to do, and you are living in known and persistent disregard of the explicit command of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Important Changes in the Postal Rates are suggested by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General in his annual report issued last week. One of them is, that if one-cent postage should be adopted, letters of the matter now included in the third and fourth classes—that is, general printed matter and merchandise—be included in one class at the rate of one cent for two ounces. The proposition to reduce the letter rate from two cents for one ounce to one cent for two ounces would not, he believes, be so serious a loss to the Department as appears at first sight. The majority of the letters would be of about the same weight as now, while the number would doubtless increase. The number of letters mailed during the fiscal year just closed was 1,769,800,000.

The Suggestion that Congress Should Force upon the Sioux, by a legislative act, the bargain the tribe has rejected should not find favor. The Sioux were asked to dispose of one-half of the great Dakota Reservation. They did not, it appears, absolutely refuse to sell, but demanded better terms than those offered. It is now proposed to take the land summarily, giving its owners whatever price Congress may deem fit. It appears that a bill will be introduced for this purpose at the coming session. That way of dealing with the red men, no doubt, has precedents, yet it would make rather a sharp contrast with the professions of desire to recognize Indian rights and Indian liberty to sell or keep the land with which the original project was broached. The element of consent would disappear as completely as the supposition that when the Government has once pledged itself to make a certain reservation the property of the Indians forever, this pledge can be relied upon. No doubt it would be for the interest of the red men, as it is of the white, to open the Sioux Reservation, but what would be dishonest in dealing with white men, would be equally dishonest in dealing with red men. It may be hoped that this fact will not be forgotten.

The Mining Disaster in Kansas on November 10 was one of the most fatal of recent years. It occurred in the Santa Fe Mine, in the village of Prontenac. The company operating the mine had an unusual press of business and had taken on a number of extra men. They had 164 men in the pit on the morning of the catastrophe. Two explosions of fire-damp were heard, and pieces of slate and large logs of wood were thrown out of the shaft. What must have occurred was soon realized by those above, and when the shaft was cleared sufficiently to allow the cage to descend the worst fears were realized. Dead bodies lay around everywhere, buried under huge pieces of rock. The choke-damp drove away the rescuers for a time, but the cage was lowered, and some of the wounded crawled upon it and were brought up. The fans were got to work and the rescuers again descended. Their first efforts were directed to the wounded, and nine men were brought up. Then the dead bodies at the bottom of the shaft were taken out. There were thirty-seven there, and in the farther workings more were found. The air was too foul that day for an extended search, but it was clear that all in the mine must be dead. The scene above was heartrending. Women with babes in their arms clustered around the cage each time it came up, shrieking and groaning. One went utterly demented. There is scarcely a house in the village that has not suffered at least one bereavement. In one there is a girl who lost father, brother, and lover in the catastrophe. It is supposed that at least sixty men must have perished.

A Steamship Collision between the Umbria of the Cunard line and the Iberia of Marseilles. France, occurred on November 10 off Long Island. The Cunarder left New York for Queenstown, at 10:45 A. M., and passed Sandy Hook safely. A dense fog prevailed shortly afterward, and her engines were slowed down. Almost immediately a whistle was heard, and a big steamer loomed up in the fog. Apparently the two vessels were too near when they sighted to avert a disaster. The Umbria crashed into the Iberia's side, carrying away her stern. The Umbria's captain stopped his vessel and sent to see what injury had been done. It was thought that the Iberia would float, and her captain asked to be towed back to port. Later, however, her bulkheads gave way under the strain, and as towing would be dangerous, her captain and his crew of thirty men were taken on board the Umbria and brought back to New York. The Umbria was but little injured, and after a short delay for repairs, started again on her voyage. Providentially no lives were lost.

The Position and Progress of Civil-Service reform formed the subject of an address delivered in New York, on November 16, by Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, ex-chairman of the National Civil-Service Commission. He said that 5,000 clerks in the departments at Washington were made subject to the civil-service rules. When the law first went into operation all of the important custom houses were embraced, with their 3,000 employees. The number of offices thus taken away from public patronage was 15,000. Before the close of President Arthur's term, 7,000 applicants were examined and over 2,000 of them put in office. They were a better class than had occupied the same places before, and a great improvement in the management of the departments resulted. The present number of offices under the law is now a little over 16,000. There are 100,000 offices which Mr. Eaton thought would ultimately come under its operation. He said that civil-service reform was a non-partisan movement; that it was aimed against methods practiced by both parties; and the bill establishing the commission was passed only because public sentiment demanded it, and not because the party representatives in Congress desired it.

A Significant Expression of Ministerial Opinion, on the subject of Home Rule for Ireland, was made in London on November 14. A large number of Nonconformist clergymen of Ireland, who, as a rule, are strongly Liberal, signed an address which was presented at a meeting in London to Lord Salisbury and Lord Hartington by the Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly. The clergymen strongly deprecated the project of Home Rule, and Lord Hartington showed that he appreciated the significance of their attitude by saying that, although Mr. Gladstone had attacked the Unionists, he failed to answer their contention that Irish Nonconformists were better able to judge the question than their English brethren who supported Mr. Gladstone. Neither of the two parties in Ireland could be trusted to govern the whole. To leave the weaker section at the mercy of their hereditary opponents would be disgraceful. Lord Salisbury declared that he looked with terror at the insanity which had seized English statesmen. They were told to trust to the generous instincts of Irishmen. But revolutionaries always pushed the weak aside, and the Parnellites would not be thrust aside by the sudden appearance of refined, scruplous, and honorable statesmen.

The Parnell Commission was Occupied During the whole of last week in listening to evidence proving that outrages had been committed in Ireland. This fact has never been doubted, and it appears somewhat irrelevant to the question at issue, which is whether Mr. Parnell and other Irish members of Parliament had any connection with the outrages, or controlled the men who committed them. The President of the commission, on November 14, called the attention of the lawyers to this point and said the commission would form an opinion upon whether persons against whom charges were made could be connected with outrages by the mere proof that outrages were committed. They would be unworthy of the position in which they were placed, if they were not able to keep their minds in a state of equilibrium upon this point. He hoped, however, that it would be found possible to curtail the amount of evidence of this kind. The Parnellites have made an appeal for funds. The daily expenses of the trial are enormous, and the League treasury will soon be exhausted.

The Joint Effort of Germany and England for the suppression of the slave trade in Africa is to be directed to the prevention of the export trade in human flesh. In the official correspondence between the two Governments, published last week, Prince Bismarck recognized the existence of the evil in the interior, but said he believed that a military expedition would fail. It appeared to be desirable to confine their joint action at first to a maritime blockade. Portugal must be pressed to forbid the exportation of munitions from her colonies in the vicinity of Zanzibar. Lord Salisbury thought that the extension of French influence in Madagascar and Comoro had stimulated the slave trade. The French, he said, were as anxious as other nations to destroy the traffic, but their naval force there was very small. He had complained of the refusal of the French to allow a search to be made of suspected vessels sailing under their flag, and France had now agreed to permit such search to be made—not in all cases, but as an incident of the blockade. In conclusion he said that the blockade would be strictly limited to the two objects indicated.

The Republicans of France are Excited Over a Royalist gathering held on November 11, at Romans, at which the chiefs of the party and many titled persons were present. Monsignor Cabrieres, a well-known Royalist prelate, preached to the assembly. In concluding his address, he said: "France is agitated and nervous. Her impressionable nature impels her with astonishing facility to rush to whatever side promises her a saviour. Her nerves are now as excited as they have been at any time within the century." Other indications of a movement are noted, and the Temps and other journals call attention to the speech made by Baron de Breteuil, as an indication of the abdication of the Monarchists in favor of Boulanger.

The Mysterious White Pacha, Whose Movements in Africa have caused much curiosity, is again reported in action. A cable despatch, coming by way of Cairo, states that the White Pacha has fought a battle in the Bahr-el-Ghazel region, with disastrous results to the dervishes. As the date of this engagement is not given, no definite conclusions can be drawn from the report. It would seem, however, to disprove the claim of Captain Van Gele, that he himself, and not Stanley, or any other, was the "White Pacha." Captain Van Gele returned to Europe from the Congo country about the middle of September. If he was not the mysterious white man, the probability that it was Stanley is strengthened.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal, have been received since our last acknowledgement to the amount of $6. They are from: East Orange, N. J., $1; Morganville, N. Y., $1; Stamford, Conn., $1; South Manchester, Conn., $3. We have still many names of colored ministers on hand who have written, testifying of the benefits they have derived from studying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past year, and gratefully acknowledging the help it has been to them in their work. Any Christian reader having the interest of the colored race at heart, could find no better way of benefiting the race at small cost than by contributing to this fund. In helping the preachers, the congregations are helped, too.

The Death of Dr. Summers, the Well-known medical missionary in Africa, is the sad news in a letter we have received from his friend and helper Dr. George D. Dowkontt, the Director of the Medical Missionary Association in New York. Dr. Summers has been laboring in Africa since 1885. He came to New York in 1879, and studied medicine under Dr. Dowkontt, for the purpose of fitting himself for the foreign mission field. After passing his examination, and receiving his M. D. diploma, he set out for Africa. He spent a short time at Loanda, and then proceeded to Melange, where he remained a year. His work there was much blessed, and after it was fully established he wrote to Dr. Dowkontt for some one to succeed him, and started on a six months' journey of one thousand miles to the further side of the Congo. In December, 1886, he was at Luluaburg, on the Kasai River, and was making that place a centre of missionary tours. The cause and date of his death are as yet unknown. A portrait and life of him will be published in this journal soon.

A Hindoo's Ashes are to be Scattered on the sea by a passenger on the Cunard steamship Umbria, which sailed from New York on November 10. A short time ago a Hindoo named Gorinda Row Sattay came on a visit to this country from Sholapore, India. Sattay, as he was familiarly called, was a finely educated man, and had arranged to remain in New York and teach Sanskrit. The rigors of this climate were, however, particularly severe upon his delicate frame during the early weeks of autumn, and two weeks ago he died. Sattay's dying wish was to be cremated after death, and while he laid no injunction upon the friends about him regarding his ashes, his well-known national opposition to burial caused them to plan another disposition of them. The ashes were accordingly taken out on the Cunard steamer Umbria by the President of the Aryan Theosophical Society, who will scatter them over the waters of the Atlantic Ocean on the voyage to Liverpool. Precisely what doctrine underlies this disposition of the dead body is not stated, but it can make no difference to the man himself. God is able, even in this case, to reunite soul and body on the day when a final account must be given of the life they lived together in the world. (Rev. 20: 13.)

A Suit to Recover Brains has Been Commenced in San Francisco. The Chronicle of that city states that papers have been served on the Coroner, requiring him to show cause why the brain of an executed murderer should not be given to the father and mother of the deceased. It appears that after the execution the question of insanity, which was raised at the trial, still excited the interest of specialists in brain disorders, and an application was made to the Coroner for permission to dissect the head of the murderer. The Coroner granted the request, and the brain was removed for examination. The body was given to the parents, but on their discovery that the brain was missing, they entered a replevin suit, claiming that they had a right to the whole of the body of their dead son. Their grievance is only a sentimental one, but it is stated that they will press it to the utmost extent the law will allow. Though they do not set a money value on the strange property for which they are to contend with the Coroner, they apparently regard it as valuable. They make a mistake that is very common. Comparatively few realize the true relative values of the body and the soul. The body is pampered and its desires gratified at the cost of money and daily toil, while the soul with its momentous interests is neglected. (Matt. 6: 25.)

A Silent Wedding Ceremony was Performed in Brooklyn, N. Y., on November 14. A large assemblage of guests was gathered in a handsome residence of that city in the evening, and a reporter who noticed the festivity inquired the cause. He was informed that the daughter of the owner was to be married, and as the ceremony would be a novel one he might go in and witness it. At the appointed hour he saw the bride, handsomely attired in lavender moire, stand up with the groom, a young sculptor of New York, before the clergyman, whom he recognized as Dr. Gallaudet. Not a word was spoken, but the interest which was manifested by the company showed that the ceremony was in progress. Then the reporter perceived that the young couple were deaf mutes, and that they were attending to questions put to them by Dr. Gallaudet's rapid fingers, and answering them in the same manner. Among the witnesses were several members of Dr. Gallaudet's Deaf Mute Club, who intelligently followed the questions and responses of the ceremony. At the conclusion the couple were declared man and wife, and were congratulated in the usual fashion. An unintelligent observer might have attached little moment to the gestures of the clergyman and the young man and woman, but their subsequent lives would show him that, to them, the ceremony meant union. It should be so with every one who by faith enters into union with Christ. The union may not be noticed, or not be understood, by outsiders, but its effects should be seen in a changed life. (II Cor. 5: 17.)

An Electrified Meat Market in New Haven, Conn., caused some excitement a few days ago. Through some disarrangement of the electric light wires the market suddenly became charged with electricity. The salesman laying his hand on a big cleaver received a shock that set him howling with pain. A man who was taking some oysters from a basket which rested against a water-pipe, dropped them with a cry. Another man was told to bring the carcase of a lamb from a hook at the back of the stand, but when he put his shoulder under it and threw his arms around it he received a shock which threw him to the floor. A woman came along and stopped to examine the cabbages in a barrel at the door, but the first she picked up set her screaming and groaning with the prickling sensation which passed from her hands through her body. Not until a lineman, who was sent for, readjusted the wires could any article in the market be touched without receiving a shock more or less violent, according to its nature and position. The surprise of the people was the greater because it came from familiar objects, which had not, before, produced painful sensations. An analogous experience is in the memory of every true Christian. After his conversion the world and all things in his life are changed to him. Pursuits and amusements which, before, yielded him pleasure, would shock his conscience and give him positive pain. But, unlike the experience in the market, the changed condition is not in them but in him. (II Cor. 5: 17.)

A Twenty-five Years' Search for a Missing brother was rewarded with success last week, though the triumph was marred by melancholy circumstances. Every year since the close of the war the War Department has received a letter from a lady, inquiring if anything had been heard of her brother, who enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment, and disappeared at the battle of Spottsylvania. Each year a reply in the negative was sent. It seems that the young man was a favorite in his company, and when he was missed after the battle, his comrades made every effort to find his body, believing that he must have been shot. They could find no trace of him. They then raised a flag of truce, and looked for him among the dead in the enemy's lines, but he was not there. Afterward a fruitless search was made for him in the Southern prisons. Since that time his sister has never heard a word from him; but she persisted in the belief that he was alive, and never relaxed her efforts to find him. Last week the police found an insane man wandering in the streets of Boston, and held him while inquiries were made for his friends. The lady heard of it, and went to see him. She found that he was her brother, but he was too demented to recognize her. He had been shot in the head in the battle, and had been insane for a quarter of a century. While his sister had been searching for him, he had been confined in various lunatic asylums, and in the intervals had wandered about in different States. Christian workers, who are seeking souls for the Master, are engaged in a search for their lost brothers who are crazed by the madness of sin. But, happily, when they are recovered, they are delivered from their malady. (Luke 15: 17, 18.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Yaroo M. Neesan, the Persian student who has been preparing in New York for missionary work in his native country, and whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on December 23, 1886, was ordained by Bishop Potter on November 5.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the converted pugilist, has had large meetings at Tarport, Pa. The Methodist church, in which they were held, was crowded each night to the doors by a most attentive congregation. Local journals describe the work as very successful.

Gifts amounting to over eighty thousand dollars are announced by the president and trustees of Princeton College. Of this sum $50,000 has been contributed by Mrs. Susan D. Brown, which is to go toward the erection of a new dormitory, which is much needed.

Rev. S. Gascoigne, Fort Simcoe, Washington Territory, asks readers of this journal who do not keep their copies for binding, to send them to him when they are done with. Many Indians in his Sunday-schools can read, but have no books or papers, nor money to buy them.

Rev. H. C. Yatman's services in Galveston, Texas, are stated by a correspondent to have aroused a remarkable movement there. Such crowds have attended, and so deep an interest has been manifested, as to astonish the citizens and encourage the hope of permanent results.

Rev. John Drake, an English evangelist, who is visiting this country, would like to engage in evangelistic work while he is here. His terms are his expenses and a free-will offering. His address is P. O. Box 198, Norwich, Chenango Co., N. Y.

There are now 191 Societies of Christian Endeavor in New Jersey, with a membership of over ten thousand, representing eight denominations. The societies are found in 65 Presbyterian churches, 53 Baptist, 24 Reformed (Dutch), 20 Methodist, 14 Congregational, 1 Episcopal, 1 Christian, and 1 Union.

Major George A. Hilton has commenced an evangelistic tour in the Pacific States, which we trust will be much blessed. His appointments are as follows: Laramie, Wyoming Ter., November 21–25; Evanston, November 29 to December 2; Tacoma, Washington Ter., December 7–12; Seattle, December 15–23.

At the November meeting of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, grants of books were made to various correspondents in the United States and foreign lands; the aggregate value being about $8,762. The issues from the Bible House during October were 83,011 copies; issues since April 1, 545,457 copies.

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea has been holding meetings at Owen Sound, Ont., Canada. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches united in the work, and over two hundred persons publicly professed faith as the result of God's blessing on his preaching. From that place he went to London, Ont., where preparations were made for ensuring a large attendance at his meetings.

Mr. C. S. Mason, who has been until this month State Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Associations in California, has resigned to undertake evangelistic work, chiefly among young men. The State Association reluctantly accepted his resignation, and passed a resolution heartily commending him in his new sphere, and praying for a blessing on his labors. His address for this month will be, Young Men's Christian Association, Albany, N. Y. Afterward, 232 Sutter St., San Francisco.

City Missionaries, Christian Workers, and others may obtain miscellaneous back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mission, hospital, and prison work, and for general distribution, at $1 per 100. They will be found most valuable as tracts. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A PARADOX.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"When I am weak, then am I strong." II Cor. 12 : 10.

A Significant Experience—One Common to All—I. The Terms of the Paradox Reversed—Strong Men Finding Themselves Weak—Strong to Win Heaven by Good Works—Strong to Turn to God at Any Time—Christians Strong in Knowledge—In Experience—In Wisdom and Prudence—II. The Weak Finding Themselves Strong—Must be Consciously Weak—Contritely Weak—Will Have Firm Standing-Ground—Has a Commission to Support Him—Is Driven to his God.

THE expression is paradoxical, and seems somewhat singular; yet it was the experience of the apostle Paul, a man of calm spirit, by no means fanciful, a wise man, and far removed from a fanatic. It was the experience of one who was led of the Spirit of God, and therefore it was a gracious experience: the experience of one who was a father in Israel, who could safely bid us be imitators of him, even as he imitated the Lord Jesus Christ; and therefore it was a safe experience. If we are weak, so was Paul; and if, like him, we are strong in our weakness, we shall be in the best of company. If the same things be seen in us which were wrought in the apostle of the Gentiles, we may join with him in glorying in infirmities, because the power of Christ doth rest upon us, and we may count ourselves happy that with such a saint we can cry, "When I am weak, then am I strong."

I. Perhaps I can expound the text best if I first turn it

The Other Way Up, and use it as a warning. When I am strong, then am I weak. Perhaps, while thinking of the text thus turned inside out, we shall be getting light upon it to be used when we view it with the right side outwards, and see that when we are weak, then we are strong. I am quite sure that some people think themselves very strong, and are not so. Their proud consciousness of fancied strength is the indication of a terrible weakness. We have among us certain persons who think that they can do all that is needful for their own salvation whenever they please to do so. They can perform all sorts of good works, or at least quite enough to carry them to heaven. Their first idea is that they are to be saved by their own doings; and they really expect to be so saved. They may admit that they have a few faults and flaws in their character; but these are so trifling as to be hardly worth mentioning, and God Almighty is too merciful to be very particular. Their lives have been excellent, their tempers amiable, their manners courteous, their spirit generous, and they quite believe that by keeping on at the same pace they will win the prize; if they do not, who will? Ah, my friend, there is

No Going to Heaven that Way

—by self and the works of self! Your error is a common one, but it is fatal. I have seen many epitaphs of persons, placed by the mistaken kindness of friends upon their tombstones, which I felt sure would have been sufficient to shut them out of heaven if they had been true. These departed worthies do not appear to have been sinners at all; their virtues were superlative, their faults non-existent. I wonder how they would behave themselves in heaven, if they were really admitted there! All the rest are singing, "We have washed our robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb"; but these needed no washing, and so they would be likely to strike up a little song by themselves, and sing, "Our robes never needed washing; we kept them white as snow." What a discord that would create in the music of the skies!

No, my strong and virtuous hearer, you are under a grave delusion. There is a great similarity between your talk and the talk of that religious individual who went up to the temple in our Saviour's days, and, standing before the thrice-holy God, dared to say, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are." He was not justified that day, nor will you be. A poor tax-gatherer, despised by himself, and an offcast from his own people, stood in the temple at the same time, and all that he dared to say was, "God be merciful to me a sinner." This unworthy sinner went to his house justified, while the other worthy person was not accepted. If you think yourselves strong enough to procure heaven by your own efforts, you are ignorantly insulting the cross of Christ, for you seem to insinuate that your virtues can avail you without Jesus.

Listen to me a moment, and quit your you, my dear hearer, cannot keep the law of God, for you have already broken it. How can you preserve a crystal vase entire when you have already dashed it to atoms? You must now be saved by the merits and the strength of another, or not at all; for your own merit is out of the question, through past failure. That strength of yours, upon which you dote so much, is perfect weakness. May the Lord show you this, and make you faint at heart on that account; for then you shall be strong, with real and saving strength! Now your imaginary strength is making you really weak, and that boasted merit of yours is shutting you out from true righteousness. He that is strong in the notion of merit is weak even to utter folly before the God of truth.

"Yes," we hear you reply, "there is a gospel way of salvation. We know that there is, for you preach it continually. You tell us that men must repent, and believe the gospel; that they must be renewed in the spirit of their minds, and must both overcome sin, and follow after holiness." Yes, I do say all that; but what do you say to it? Is it really so that you find here a Ground for Your Own Strength?

Do you say, "I feel that I can repent whenever I please, and believe in Jesus when I choose"? Ah! then I must assure you that when you are strong in that way, you are weak. I never yet knew anybody repent who gloried in his power to repent; I never yet knew a man heart-broken for sin who boasted that he could break his own heart when and where he pleased. "What!" cries one, "surely I can believe in Jesus Christ when I please!" I have not denied that statement, have I? But I tell you that your notion of power to believe is your weakness; and I would rather by half hear you cry, with deep solemnity, "Oh that God would give me faith! Lord, help my unbelief!"

So far I have spoken by way of warning to unconverted people. I desire now to say a word to those who profess to be Christians, and, let us hope, are so; but they are, in a measure, erring in the same way as those to whom I have spoken. They are remarkably strong: at least, in their own esteem although others fear that the Philistines will capture them. By this token may they know their own weakness—even by this, that they think themselves strong.

First, many are wonderfully strong as to knowledge. They know almost everything. If in any department they are a little short, they make up for it by knowing so much more in another direction. If they are too narrow here, they overlap there. They are knowing men, and need no man to tell them so. They are not children, but quite able to think for themselves. They are not credulous, but amazingly clear-headed and cultured. I have noticed that these fine gentlemen have been the first to deny the faith, and to fall into all manner of heresies. Do you wonder? Those who are so very sure are always the most uncertain. O brethren, when we are very wise in our own esteem, we are bordering upon fools, even if we have not already entered into that company. When we tremblingly sit at Jesus' feet, to learn everything fresh, and fresh from Him; when we shudder at anything that questions His Deity, or lowers His sacrifice; when we shut up a book and cast it from us, because we feel that it pollutes us with unbelief—then are we wise and strong.

Again, I have noticed some professed Christian people wonderfully Strong Through Experience.

Their experience has been very extensive, and the knowledge it has brought them they consider to be specially profound, and, consequently, they are not afraid of temptation, for they feel that they are too wise to be entrapped. They can go just so far, and then stop, for they are fitted with the patent brakes of prudence. They are such good mountain climbers that they can stand on the edge of the precipice, and look over, and even hang over, without fear of their ever being giddy and falling over. Of course they would not advise other people to go quite so far as they may safely go; but then, what is temptation to other men is no temptation to them. Their vessel is so tight and trim, and they understand navigation so perfectly, that they rather like a tempest than not, just to show how well their vessel can behave in a storm. Ah me! When you next read the list of wrecks, you may expect to see the name of their ship among the castaways. Old birds may not be caught with chaff, but they can be shot with a gun. No one is out of danger, and no one is more in danger than the man who is carnally secure. Those who feel that their experience, be it what it may, only teaches them that the farther they can keep from temptation the better, these are in a better state.

Let us note another point. I have known certain Christians who thought themselves and prudence. They have been gifted with clear insight and a measure of shrewdness, and have, therefore, felt that their judgment on most subjects was that of an umpire. If we were called upon to select a man who, as to his life as a whole, perpetrated the greatest folly, we should mention Solomon. Yet he was the wisest of men. Yes, the cream of wisdom, when curdled, makes the worst of folly. Then, brethren, whenever we feel sure of our own superior intelligence, let us suspect ourselves of weakness.

Further, dear friends, we shall often find that our strength will lie in patience—in extreme weakness which yields itself up to the will of God without the power or will to murmur.

> "And when it seems no chance nor change
> From grief can set me free,
> Hope finds its strength in helplessness,
> And, patient, wait on thee."

I am sure that in reference to power, either to do or to suffer rightly, we are not strong when we compliment ourselves upon our ability; and we are strong when, under a sense of absolute inability, we depend wholly upon God. That sermon preached in the glory of our oratory turned out to be mere husks for swine; while that discourse which we delivered in weakness, with a humble hope that God would use it, proved to be royal meat for the Lord's chosen. That work which you performed in the vigor of your unquestioned talent came to nothing, while that quiet act which you washed with your tears, and perfumed with your prayers, will live, and yield you sheaves.

Creature Strength

brings forth nothing at all which has life in it: only the seed which the Creator puts into the hand of our weakness will produce a harvest.

So it is in bearing as well as acting. If we say concerning sickness, "I shall never be impatient. I can bear it like a Stoic," what of that? You will then have done no more than many have done before you, with no great gain to themselves or to others. But if, bowing your head before the Lord, you wait His sovereign will, and say, "Lord, help me! If thy left hand shall smite me, let thy right hand sustain me. I am willing to drink this bitter cup, saying, 'Not as I will, but as thou wilt.' Lord, help me!"—you shall bear up triumphantly, and come out of the furnace refined, to the praise and the glory of your God. When you fancy that you are strong to suffer, you will fail; but in conscious weakness you will be enabled to play the man.

II. Now, let us take our text the right way upwards. "When I am weak, then am I strong." "When" and "then" are of the text—the hinges upon which it turns. "When I am weak." What does that mean? It means when the believer is consciously weak, when he painfully feels, and distinctly recognizes, that he is weak, then he is strong. In truth, we are always weak, whether we know it or not; but when we not only believe this to be the fact, but see it to be the fact—then it is that we are strong. When it is forced home upon us, that we are less than nothing and vanity—when our very soul echoes and re-echoes that word, "Without me ye can do nothing"—then it is that we are strong.

We are strong when we are contritely weak. When we confess that much of our weakness is our fault—a weakness which we ought to have overcome—even then we have in that weakness a real strength. The sort of weakness that makes a man say, "I cannot be any stronger, I am doing my best," is not strength, but folly; but that weakness which makes you lament your failures and deplore your shortcomings, has in it a holy stimulus and force. When you can neither repent, nor believe, nor love as you wish to do, you are repenting, believing, and loving with a strength which is more true than apparent. It is the will with which we act which is the strength of the action; and when the will is so powerful that it makes us mourn because we cannot find how to perform its bidding, then are we strong according to the divine measurement of strength. Contrite weakness is Spiritual Strength.

When a man is thoroughly weak—not only partially, but altogether weak—then is he strong. When, apart from the Lord Jesus Christ, he is utter weakness, and nothing more, then it is that he is strong. Let me persuade you to make a full confession of weakness to the Lord. Say, "Lord, I cannot do what I ought to do; I cannot do what I want to do; I cannot do what I used to do; I cannot do what other people do; I cannot do what I mean to do; I cannot do what I am sure I shall do; I cannot do what I feel impelled to do; and over this sinful weakness I mourn." Then add, "Lord, I long to serve thee perfectly, yet I cannot do it. Unless thou help, me I can do nothing aright." Brother, you are strong while you plead in that fashion. You can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth you; and he will strengthen you, now that you are emptied of self. How true it is, "When I am weak, then am I strong"!

I have brought out the "when." Now lend me your ears and hearts just for a minute, while I bring out the "then." "Then am I strong." When is that? Why, a man is strong when he is consciously weak, because now he has reached the truth. He really is weak; and if he does not know that he is so, he is under the influence of a falsehood. Now, a lie is weakness.

Lying Strength

is all fluff and foam; a mere appearance, a mockery, a delusion. Nothing hinders from getting the reality like contentment with a mere appearance. The true heart is heartily sick of shows and shams, and it cries, "Lord, help me to get rid of these shadows! Help me to come at the truth! Help me to deal with realities!" When you are made to feel your utter weakness you are on sure ground of truth—unpleasant truth, no doubt, yet sure truth. Therefore, a man becomes strong when he is consciously weak, because he is on the truth, and is not being flattered by false hopes.

Next, he will be strong, because he will only go with a commission to support him. He will not be eager to run without being sent. He says within himself, when he proposes a service to himself, "No, I am too weak to undertake anything of my own head." He will wait for a call. This is not the kind of man that will climb up into a pulpit, and from a dizzy brain pour out nonsense. He will not crave to lead, for he feels that he needs much help even to follow. He feels himself too weak to set up for a master in Israel. This is not the kind of man that will venture into argument with sceptics for the fun or for the glory of the thing. Oh, no; he is too weak for that. He says, "If I am called to defend the faith, I will do it in God's strength, hoping that it will be given me in the same hour what I shall speak. If I am called to preach I will preach, and nobody shall stop me; for the Lord will be with my mouth. But, you see, until the man is conscious of his own weakness, he will run without being sent; and there is nobody so weak as that man.

The man who is consciously weak is strong, next, because of the holy caution that he will be sure to use. He will be on his guard, because he does not feel able to cope with adversaries. He will ask for a convoy for his little barque, for he is aware of pirates. If this weak man has to pass through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, depend upon it he will carry in his hand the weapon of All-prayer, like a drawn sword. The man that has strength goes hurrying on over hedge and ditch, and soon comes into mischief; but the consciously weak pilgrim keeps to the high-road, and travels carefully; and he is strong.

Moreover, when a man is weak, then is he strong, because he is sure to pray, and Prayer is Power.

The man who laments his weakness is sure to cry to the strong for strength. The more his weakness presses on him, the more will he pray. While he can do without his God, he will do without his God; but when his own weakness becomes utter and entire, and he is ready to perish, then he turns unto his Lord, and is made strong. The utterly weak cry out unto God as nobody else does. He is too weak to play at praying: he groans, he sighs he weeps. In his abject weakness he prevails, as Jacob did. The weaker a man is in himself, the stronger he is in prayer, if he makes use of his weakness as an appealing argument: "Lord, if I were strong, Thou mightest leave me. Do not leave me, for I am weakness itself! I am the feeblest child in all Thy family; leave me not, neither forsake me. If Thou leavest any, leave not Thy poor dying infant, that can hardly wail out its griefs." Weakness, as a plea with God in prayer, becomes a source of strength.

When we are weak we are strong, again, because then we are driven away from self to God. All strength is in God, and it is well to come to the one solitary storehouse and source of might. There is no power apart from God. As long as you and I look to the creature, we are looking to a cracked, broken cistern that holds no water; but when we know that it is broken, and that there is not a drop of water in it, then we hasten to the great fountain and well-head. While we rest in any measure upon self, or the creature, we are standing with one foot on the sand; but when we get right away from human nature, because we are too weak to have the least reliance upon self whatever, then we have both feet on the rock; and this is safe standing.

Last of all, dear friends, I believe that, when a man is weak, he becomes strong to a large extent, because his weakness compels him to concentrate all his faculties. A sense of weakness brings out all the and leads him to call in all the energy within his reach. Many a poor, weak brother, who says all the little that he knows, gives forth more instruction than the learned divine who only favors his people with a small portion of his vast stores. When a man, in serving God, spends himself to the last farthing, he will often far more enrich his hearers than the man of ten talents who uses his resources with a prudent parsimony. Dear brother, it will often be a good thing for you to feel, "Now, God helping me, I must do my very utmost this time. I have so little ability that every faculty within me must be wide awake, and serve God at its best." Thus your weakness will arouse you and set you on fire, and by the blessing of God it will be the means of gaining you strength.

Very well, then, let us pick up our tools and go to our work rejoicing, feeling—Well, I may be weaker, or I may be stronger in myself, but my strength is in my God. If I should ever become stronger, then I must pray for a deeper sense of weakness, lest I become weak through my strength. And if I should ever become weaker than I am, then I must hope and believe that I am really becoming stronger in the Lord. Whether I am weak or strong, what matters it? He who never fails and never changes, will perfect His strength in my weakness, and this is glory to me. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A FUTILE OCCUPATION.*

WELL do I remember that singular character, Professor John Wilson, of Edinburgh—"Christopher North," he was generally called. He was passionately fond of angling. One day, after fishing for hours in a loch in Selkirkshire, without getting anything, being watched all the time by a shepherd and his dog, he was turning despondently away, when the shepherd said, "Ye'll not have killed many trout, sir?" "No, I have had no sport at all; not a nibble." "I dare say no," said the other, "for it's well known there never was a trout in that loch from the beginning of creation." But the man who is seeking success and satisfaction in the world is pursuing as hopeless a game.

A Foreigner's Changed Opinion.

Set your face determinedly against all underhand dealing. Have nothing to do with shuffling or shams of any kind. Do your own part to purify the market-place, and to make the commerce of our land such as Heaven can smile upon it. Detest the gospel of shoddy. Hate all trickery, imposition, and evasion. In the smallest trifles act as under the eye of God. Plant your foot firmly on the line of stern principle, and dare the devil himself to persuade you to cross that line. Even as regards this world, dishonesty is the worst policy. It means, in the end, death to your peace, death to your comfort, death to your interests, and death to your soul. Only two days ago I heard of a young man who had business transactions with a foreign merchant, and was asked, some time since, to send out certain packages of goods marked of a less weight than they actually were, the object being to evade the payment of a heavy import duty. Many a young fellow would have smiled and done it. The friend I am speaking of telegraphed, "I cannot, and won't do it." "Very well," replied the foreigner; "there are plenty of others who will, and our business connection is at an end." This meant a heavy loss to the conscientious youth. Since then the foreign merchant has written him as follows: "Enclosed is a draft for ——, which please put to my credit. I am sending my son to you to learn your way of business. There is nobody in whom I have so much confidence as I have in you. Will you take him into your office, and make him the sort of man that you are yourself?"

General Gordon's Heroic Act.

The men who in any trade or occupation have risen to the top of the tree have been men who, to use President Lincoln's favorite expression, "kept pegging away," and were never in the habit of shelving their own work upon other persons. There is a proverb I used to meet with in Turkey, which advises you never to do to-day what can be put off till to-morrow, and never to do yourself what you can get another to do for you. I hope you will go as much as possible in the teeth of such degrading counsel. The advice General Gordon gave is incomparably more worthy your acceptance. The occasion I allude to was the first day on which fire was opened at Sebastopol from the twenty-one-gun battery, and when the sand-bags forming one of the embrasures caught fire. A corporal and a sapper of the engineers were told off to repair the damage. The corporal ordered his companion to mount the embrasure, undertaking himself to hand up the fresh bags to him. The firing was heavy at the time, and the sapper demurred to this arrangement, suggesting that the corporal should get up, and that he would do the handing-up business. There was a bit of a wrangle over it. General Gordon, hearing the dispute, came to the spot, mounted the pile of bags himself, and whilst a storm of bullets swept around him, coolly performed the task. Thereupon he quietly descended, and looking sternly at the corporal, said, "Never order a man to do a thing you are afraid to do yourself."

A Foundling's Crest.

About three hundred and fifty years ago there might have been seen trudging along a country lane, not a hundred miles from London, a weary, anxious-looking woman with an infant in her arms. After a while she stood still beside a gate that opened into a field, and, looking keenly on every side to be sure that no one was near, she wrapped the little one in her shawl, laid it down gently under a hedge, and, turning into the lane again, presently vanished out of sight. An hour or two later there chanced to pass down that lane a merry school-boy on his way to a neighboring farm. It was in the warm spring-time, when the hedge-rows were gay with primroses and the insects were fluttering amongst the grass; and as the light-hearted youth scampered whistling along, he thought he heard the loud chirp of a grasshopper, so he bounded over the hedge, and stooped down to catch it, when lo! there lay before him a baby smiling in its innocence! Delighting in his discovery, he took it up in his arms and ran home joyfully with the prize. His mother, a humble farmer's wife, was too kind-hearted to refuse to admit the foundling; and, though she had children of her own, resolved to keep the little stranger, whose life had in all likelihood, been saved through the chirp of a grasshopper.

You know the rest of the story. Years passed, and the infant grew up to be a man, and the man became one of the richest and most influential merchants of the city of London. God blessed all he took in hand, and he rose to be the most noted man in the city. As an expression of gratitude to the metropolis to which he owed so much, he founded the Royal Exchange, and when the building was completed, Sir Thomas Gresham (for it is to him that I refer) placed upon the topmost pinnacle a figure of a grasshopper, in stone, as a memento of the incident that saved his life; and there you may see it preaching to all around a lesson not unlike that which St. Paul uttered eighteen centuries ago, when he declared to the proud men of Corinth that God had chosen the weak and contemptible things of the world to serve some of His grandest purposes.

AN EVENTFUL EXCURSION.

(See Illustration.)

"Ah, Percy, you are going for a row, I see," said a lady who, with her daughter, was strolling along a path bordering one of our most beautiful rivers.

"Yes, Madam," said the young man addressed, a handsome man of about twenty-five years, who had recently left college and commenced practice as a physician in the neighborhood. "I was coming," he continued, "to your house in the hope of persuading you and Miss Folkestone to accompanying me."

"You are very kind, Percy," said Mrs. Folkestone, "but we have accepted the invitation of the Wynters to join them in an excursion, and we are just on our way to their boat-house."

The reply pained the young doctor, deeply. He was seriously in love with Connie Folkestone, and had earnestly pleaded with her widowed mother for permission to make her his wife. Connie herself would have accepted him, but she would never marry without her mother's consent, nor would she give any promise that might bring her in conflict with her mother's somewhat despotic nature. The widow had not refused him, but had not given him a definite answer, and Percy Collins believed that she was anxious to secure for her daughter a more wealthy husband than he. She was ambitious, he knew, and he feared that she would not be over scrupulous as to the character of a suitor, provided he possessed the fortune she desired her daughter to enjoy. But he worked hard, was growing in popularity, and believed that in a short time he would have such an income as would give him favor in the mother's eyes. Lately, the young Wynters had appeared rather frequently at the widow's cottage, and Percy, who knew them well as fast young men amply endowed with wealth, feared that if either asked Mrs. Folkestone for permission to win Connie's affections, she would give her consent. One of them appeared at this moment, and with a patronizing nod to the young doctor, and an elaborate greeting of the widow and her daughter, walked on with the latter, while Mrs. Folkestone followed with Dr. Collins.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Folkestone," said Collins; "it is not my habit to speak disparagingly of anyone, but I think that if you knew the character of those young men you would not consider them suitable companions for Connie."

"Ah! you are jealous, Percy; you do them an injustice. They appear to me excellent young men. A little wild, perhaps, but they will settle down as they grow older. I know what you are thinking of, but you know you are poor, and it is my duty to consider Connie's future."

"That is the very consideration I would press, dear Mrs. Folkestone," said Percy; "her future cannot be made happy by money only. No refined Christian girl, such as Connie is, could be happy married to a man leading a life such as both these young Wynters are living."

"I am not sure that Connie would be happy with you. She has her dear father's notions about religion, I know, but I think they are antiquated and narrow. A gay, cheerful husband, with the means to gratify her natural tastes, is what I should prefer for Connie; she is inclined to be morbid on that subject, and you would encourage her. But here we are at the boat-house, so I must wish you good-bye."

Percy Collins looked down very sadly from the little wharf at the gay party in the boat as Mrs. Folkestone stepped nervously in, assisted by her daughter and Mr. Alfred Wynter. He saw them push off, and then walked moodily away, oppressed by the thought that the girl he loved was in danger of being sacrificed for money. He was in no mood for boating after that, and walked away to the top of a hill overlooking the river, where he flung himself disconsolately on the grass and gazed after the boat as it glided out of sight.

How long he lay there he never knew; but it must have been two or three hours, for looking up from his reverie he noticed that the sun was near its setting, and he rose hurriedly to return home. As he did so he looked up the river, and there he saw the Wynters' boat returning. He was turning away when he was struck by its erratic movements. The young men were pulling very clumsily, with no regard to time, and Alfred especially, who was pulling stroke, was endangering the safety of the party by his awkward attempts to feather—so awkward that they would have disgraced a novice.

An instant, and a shrill scream reached his ear. Alfred's oar was deep in the water and he could not withdraw it. The boat lurched heavily to that side, and Mrs. Folkestone, springing to her feet in alarm, lost her balance and fell; her weight sufficed to overturn the light craft, and in a moment the whole party were struggling in the water. Happily, the boat had not filled, but turned completely over and floated keel uppermost, and the two ladies were clinging to it while the young men were swimming for the shore.

Quick as thought Percy Collins bounded to the edge of the stream and ran like a deer to a place where a light outrigger was moored. He soon had her detached, and was pulling swiftly for the spot where the ladies were still clinging to the wrecked boat. He was just in time to reach them, as Mrs. Folkestone, fainting from fright and exhaustion, released her grasp and sank. He managed to take her on board, and then rescued the girl he loved. He pulled hard for the shore, where he was able to find shelter and restoratives for the ladies, and then returned to look for the young men. The younger had reached the bank, but Alfred was not to be seen, and it was not for many hours that his dead body was recovered.

It was from Mrs. Folkestone's lips that Percy heard the history of the affair. He learned that both ladies noticed soon after entering the boat that the young men were excited with wine, and just before returning they produced champagne, which was offered to the ladies and declined, but of which Alfred and his brother partook freely. That accounted for the awkward pulling and for the disaster. Mrs. Folkestone's gratitude to Percy for saving her own life and that of her daughter was boundless, and profiting by the check her ambition had received, he had no difficulty in extracting from her the promise so long withheld.

The Peak of Inspiration in the Yosemite Valley.

THE PEAK OF INSPIRATION.

One of the most remarkable objects in the Yosemite Valley is the gigantic rock to which has been given the name of The Peak of Inspiration. It stands at the entrance of the Valley, and is the point from which the best view of the grandeur of that wonderful ravine can be obtained. Baron Hübner thus describes the scene which burst upon him when, climbing the western slope of the Sierras on his mustang and travelling through forests of redwood, cedar, and pine, he reached the verge of the precipice of the Peak: "In front of us, on the opposite side of the Yosemite, one single immense block of square granite, with a flattened summit and perpendicular flanks, rises out of the valley beneath. The Mexicans gave it the name of El Capitan. [It is 3,300 feet above the valley, and almost perpendicular.] Further on toward the northeast, on both sides of the abyss, rise smooth vertical walls of rock, diversified here and there by peaks and domes with narrow aerial terraces, out of which spring gigantic firs. The horizon is bounded by a complete wall of granite, higher than the mountains which surround the valley, and of which the top appears perfectly straight. This is the highest ridge of the Sierra Nevada." Winding down from the peak into the valley the traveller is astonished, at almost every step, with some new view of surpassing beauty. One of these is the Bridal Fall, which makes but two springs in a leap of over nine hundred feet from the west side of Cathedral Rock. This is again surpassed by the Yosemite Fall, which has three leaps, the first of which is 1,600 feet.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A Conflict.

No words could have made a stronger appeal to that weary, storm-tossed heart than those Mr. Bidder chose for the subject of his brief address: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." There was no eloquence, no rhetorical skill, in the old man's appeal. He had a treasure to offer that the world with all its resources could not give. A treasure for which aching hearts are pining, and all he attempted to do was to set out clearly where and how it might be obtained. How men were to come, to Whom they were to come, to whom the invitation was sent, and the boon Christ promised—those were the four points touched, and there was in all a clear note ringing, struck on the harp-string of an aged Christian's heart, which had itself basked in the sunshine and sweet calm of that delicious rest.

The effect was electrifying. Hadley, whose face had been bent downward during the address, looked up as the last words were spoken, saw the reverent, triumphant, confident affection which shone in the venerable face, and his own countenance reflected the expression. Rest—perfect peace—what to him were all other things that the world counts precious, compared with that? It was being offered to him here by one who had long enjoyed it, and as Hadley listened he was convinced that it was genuine, and was conscious that his perturbed feelings were becoming strangely tranquillized. His eyes and those of his uncle met, and tears were in both. "May the peace of God which passeth all understanding"—began the clergyman in solemn benediction, and Hadley, as he bowed his head, uttered a reverent "Amen."

"Any person present who is conscious that he has not the rest and peace of which I have been speaking," said Mr. Bidder, "but who is also conscious of his need of them and desires to possess them, may be helped in his quest by the prayers of Christian believers. We will gladly talk and pray with any such, if they will remain. Are there any here? Please answer by rising."

One after another rose in various parts of the house, and among them was the once arrogant, scornful unbeliever, Hadley Madelling.

He remained to the more private meeting afterward as invited, and when Mr. Bidder suggested that each of the seekers should state the difficulties that were troubling him and keeping him from accepting the invitation of Christ, and one after another had spoken, Hadley rose. His voice could not be steadied for a moment, but it recovered its clear tone, and he said:

"My friends, for a number of years my attitude toward religion has been a hostile one. I have not only doubted the Bible, but have openly opposed it, thinking it a gigantic fraud and imposture. But I confess to you frankly that my life of scepticism has been an unsatisfactory one—more like an arid, drouth-stricken desert than anything else to which I can compare it, and the startling fact is, the longer I traverse it the more arid does it become. Its total inadequacy to meet the wants of my life appalls me. I started out on a voyage of independent research, but my quest has thus far resulted in nothing but failure. I am tired of the arid life of unbelief. I cannot say that I am convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, but if it is true, as Christian people maintain, I want to know it, and I therefore ask you to help and instruct me, for I am blind and ignorant in spiritual matters."

A thrill of joy passed through every heart as the talented young teacher made this honest confession and humbly asked for direction, and all knelt, while Mr. Bidder and his friends pleaded with God to reveal Himself to the souls of the seekers and to guide them into all truth.

His uncle came and knelt by Hadley's side, and presently asked him if light had come.

"It seems that all the doubts I ever entertained have been gathered into one mass and hurled upon me," replied Hadley. "I cannot believe in God, or Christ, or the Bible, or prayer, and even if there is a God, I cannot believe that He will forgive all my arrogant opposition to Him. Will you pray for me?"

The old clergyman, with his arm tenderly clasped about his nephew, prayed fervently for him, for the gift of faith, for the banishment of doubt, for the illumination of the Spirit, until Hadley's heart became so unburdened that he rose to his feet saying:

"It is wonderful, wonderful! Let me go home now, and think it over."

"Before you leave," said his uncle, "allow me to give you a word of counsel and encouragement. When you get to your room, please read the fifty-first Psalm and the fifteenth chapter of Luke, and go to God in prayer."

The young sceptic took the hands of the Christian workers who grouped about him, thanked them for their interest in his welfare, and then hurried to his lodgings to carry out the instructions of his faithful counsellor. As he read the story of the prodigal son, it seemed to scintillate with new meanings. He found it especially pertinent to his own needs, and, when he gave it its proper spiritual exegesis, it appeared to be a veritable biography of his own life of unbelief: the departure of the wayward son from his father's house, his career in the land afar off, his feeding upon the husks, and his final resolution to return to his father, all these were but symbolical representations of Hadley's own experience. Then he wondered whether God would receive him, as the father in the parable received and welcomed his returning son.

He remembered that his uncle had advised him to go to God in prayer. Kneeling by his bedside, he tried to lift up his heart to God, but the feeling that he was mocking at divine things overcame him and choked his utterance, so that he could not say a word but "Lord, have mercy!"

He spent a restless night, and when morning came it seemed to him that the darkness of Erebus could not have been deeper and more impenetrable than the darkness that enveloped his soul, and had he been tormented by the fabled daughters of night, he could not have been more miserable. Some light came to him through the reading of the Scriptures, but to his astonishment he found that he was a great deal more conversant with Greek mythology than with the sacred Book that he had been criticising and deriding so long, and this fact added to his torture.

Not knowing where to find the hope-inspiring and consolatory portions of God's Word, he dipped into it here and there at random, and, as it happened, his eye fell upon a number of comminatory passages: "Woe unto the wicked; it shall be ill with him"; "The wages of sin is death"; "The soul that sinneth, it shall die"; "Your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid His face from you, that He will not hear."

All these verses seemed like so many death-sentences to his hopes of pardon. As a matter of fact, he, like many others who think themselves capable of criticising Holy Writ, found that he did not know how to use it effectually or apply it to his own needs.

All the morning, like Ixion on his wheel, he was kept revolving around and around, until his head was dizzy and his heart was sick, but with all his circular movement there was apparently no progress. After dinner he said to himself: "Perhaps Hanson could help me," and he grasped his hat and hurried to the latter's room.

"I am in trouble," he said, without circumlocution. And then he told Hanson of his public committal the evening before. The clergyman grasped his hand warmly, and as he spoke his lips quivered with joy.

"The most courageous and manly step that you have ever taken, my dear Madelling," he said. "And now tell me about your perplexities."

Hadley complied, giving as accurate a description as he could of the spiritual throes through which he had recently passed.

"Let us go at once to the law and the testimony," said Hanson, when the recital was concluded. And taking up his hand-Bible, he turned the leaves with perfect familiarity, reading the selections that were most relevant to his sceptical friend's spiritual condition. Many of the promises of God were read and explained, and it was shown that God had made all the initial overtures, and had been waiting, with outstretched arms, for the penitent sinner to accept them.

"Ah! if I could only believe in the existence of God!" said Hadley.

"Your difficulty is fundamental, I see," returned Hanson. "You seem to have gone to the very depths of unbelief. But God will reveal Himself to the agnostic as well as to any other sinner who comes to Him."

"Why does He not do so, then, in my case?" questioned Hadley.

"You must ask Him earnestly, and if He does not grant your request immediately, you must show your sincerity and earnestness by continuing to ask; and you must remember, too, that it is for wise reasons that He withholds the coveted blessing for a while."

"I cannot get hold of it; there is something, I know not what, that opposes me continually; I seem to be groping in the dark, and the door that opens into the light is bolted against me," moaned Hadley.

"Suppose you were in a dungeon as dark as your spiritual state seems to be now, and you suspected that I was on the outside and could extricate you from your imprisonment, would you not cry, 'Hanson, are you there? If you are, will you not open the door?'"

"Yes—oh, is it so simple? I see—but if there is a God I have insulted Him so arrogantly that I am ashamed to call upon Him now; it seems like mockery."

"'Though your sins be as scarlet, I will make them white as snow,'" quoted Hanson; and the verse that Hadley had thought so hackneyed and threadbare now gleamed with a new radiance. "Paul," continued Hanson, "was once an unbeliever, a vehement persecutor of the church of Christ, and yet he was accepted when he prayed."

"Paul? Ah—yes—Paul was once a rejector of Christ."

"You are near to the kingdom of God," said Hanson, with a radiant face. "Before you go, let me read you an excerpt from a prayer by a great English preacher, for I think that it will do you good." Opening the volume, Hanson read as follows:

"Almighty God, we bless Thee that Thou hast sent Thy Son to our broken-heartedness, our mourning, our unutterable distress and fear. Thou didst not send Him to our greatness and power, but to our littleness and weakness and utter insufficiency. The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost—we bless Thee for this, for in that word 'lost' we find our state. All we like sheep have gone astray."

"I feel that there is more in that prayer than I can comprehend," said Hadley, when the book was closed.

"It will become a reality to you bye and bye," returned Hanson, encouragingly.

It is not necessary to follow the young inquirer step by step through all his checkered and oscillating experience. For the confirmed unbeliever the birth-throes of the new life are usually more or less excruciating.

The evening's service still brought him more light. The following day, which was Sabbath, was an epochal day in his life. There was a joy in his heart that was altogether new to him; he felt a reverence for God's house that he had never felt before. Yet there was an unsteadiness in his emotional life that gave him constant solicitude; he felt that his hold upon God was still tremulous and uncertain; at any time he feared that the divine light—for he could call it by no other name—might be extinguished, and leave him again in Cimmerian darkness.

On Sabbath evening, which he spent in his uncle's church, he listened with rapturous joy to the discourse; but, strange to say, no sooner had he stepped from the church into the night, than his whole being was wrapped in the blackness of darkness, and all his old unbelief returned with redoubled power. He groaned aloud in his agony. His mind was filled with the most blasphemous thoughts, and rebellion ran riot in his heart.

It was a remarkable psychological experience, and perhaps it is impossible to account wholly for it. After much thought, he said to himself:

"I feel that I can believe in a God, a God of nature, of providence, of love; but Christ—I cannot believe in Him as the Messiah; He is a stumbling-block to me."

For a few hours he found some relief and satisfaction in his Christless theism; but the relief was only temporary. That night and the following day were memorable for their bald, unmitigated misery. Christless theism did not meet the wants of his being. Yet he decided to attend the service on Monday evening. He went, but derived little help from his uncle's remarks. His friend Hanson was present, and with his aged brother minister spoke to Hadley after the service.

"I am sorry to say," he said, in answer to their questions, "that all my unbelief has returned in an aggravated form. I have prayed so earnestly and continuously for light, that it seems to me that if there were such a God as some passages of the Bible describe, He would have granted my prayer. I seem to be dealing with the God of the Hebrews rather than with the God of the New Testament. Majesty and power and justice I perceive, but mercy, tenderness, and love seem to be denied me."

Mr. Bidder's face showed his disappointment, but he could only urge Hadley to continue his prayers, and assure him that in all his long experience he had never known a persevering, praying soul to fail in the end to obtain light. Mr. Hanson linked his arm in that of his friend and walked home with him. As they left the building together, Hanson said:

"I think your present condition may be a result of your past scepticism. I doubt if you will ever reach the light and truth by intellectual process. You may attain a Christless theism which would benefit you little. It is in Jesus the Incarnate Word, the Unspeakable Gift, the Vicarious Sacrifice, the Risen Mediator, that your hope lies. Accept Him as your Saviour, just as the poor ignorant rustic takes Him and trusts in Him, and peace will come first, and mental light and spiritual penetration later."

Hadley was silent, perplexed, but he knew that his friend was advising him to reverse the process he had hitherto been following. No more was said then until the two reached Hadley's lodging, when with an earnest "God bless you" the clergyman left him.

Hadley entered his room with an aching, despairing heart and a countenance overcast with gloom. On his table lay a letter which had arrived during his absence. He took it up mechanically and saw that it was from Belle Haveloek, and was quite a bulky epistle. His correspondence with her since he left college had been kept up according to promise. Its matter was chiefly concerning Hadley's work, affairs at the college, a little gossip occasionally, and a considerable amount of interchange of opinion on literary, scientific, and theological themes, and thus sometimes their epistles were swollen to large proportions. But that which Belle desired above all to see in Hadley's letters she never found there. Love was a theme that he studiously avoided. Once away from the immediate presence of her magnetizing attractions, her hold upon his affectionate nature was relaxed, and his interest in her was merely that which grew out of their intellectual affinity. When the subject of religion was alluded to, Hadley found that her enmity had lost none of its venom.

The brilliant, cynical girl was as anxious as ever that Hadley should take a bold public stand as a speaker and writer against religion. Fame, power, and posthumous glory would be his, she told him, if he took up a crusade against superstition, and his name would be enrolled on the glorious roll of those whom the world honors as its deliverers. Let him go through the land proclaiming liberty to the captives, and opening the eyes that priestcraft had blinded.

How far was Hadley from all that now! The very sight of her familar writing shocked him. He could not bear to read her letter now. Bye and bye, when this terrible anxiety was over, he would read it, and tell her all that had occurred, whether it served her for a jest or not. Little would it matter then, to him, whether she despised him or not. He took the letter and put it unopened into his desk.

ISRAEL UNDER JUDGES.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for December 2. Judges 2: 11-23, Golden Text, Heb. 3: 12.

Tribute Preferred to Obedience—Content Instead of Energy in Christian Work—Idleness a Preparation for Temptation—God's Gentle Expostulation—Voluntary Exposure to Temptation Always Perilous—A Generation Uninstructed in God's Dealings—Attracted by an Easy Religion—Abandoned to Spoilers—Externals Powerless to Convert—God Educating His People.

As the death of Moses was the signal for an advance, so was the death of Joshua. After his death "the children of Israel asked the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them?" The Lord specified Judah; and then Judah and Simeon agreed to help one another in driving out the Canaanites from their possessions; and God was signally with them, and they were daunted by nothing but the inhabitants of the valley, "because they had chariots of iron." (Judges 1: 19.) If they had counted God as more powerful than the chariots of iron, they might have conquered. But the people were contented with their possessions; they had no great objection to the occupation of the Canaanites. "And it came to pass, when Israel was strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out." They thought only of what suited them, and failed to ascertain the mind of the Lord. Oh, how like this is to

Some Christian Workers!

They have a little settled work, a certain number of meetings in the week, a comfortable little home, and a fair salary; they have the respect of the people, and a work in which they have, from time to time, tokens of blessing; what more can they want? But is this the thought of God, when He says, "Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, ... into the highways and hedges, compel them to come in, that My house may be filled?" (Luke 14: 21-23.) Surely this implies that a Christian worker after God's own heart, should put himself or herself out of the way to win souls. How many are contented with the little good they do, and, strong in their own self-esteem, they fail to follow the Spirit when He urges them to launch out into new fields of labor!

Idleness is a good soil for Satan's temptations; the people soon fell into idolatry. "An angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I have made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I sware unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break My covenant with you. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars; but ye have not obeyed My voice:

Why Have Ye Done This?"

It was a tender expostulation. God would fain have dealt gently with them, but their sin compelled Him to fall back upon His own word of warning. "Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you." We cannot put ourselves in the way of temptation without suffering for it. We may go anywhere, when sent of God, and all the influences around us cannot hurt us; but when we go unsent into danger, the influences around us are stronger than we. Pharaoh's court did not injure Joseph, and neither Nebuchadnezzar's court nor that of Darius injured Daniel, for they were for God. But Lot was a loser by his contact with Sodom, and Balaam lost his soul by considering Balak before God and His people. Both these went into danger to serve themselves. Every book we read, every conversation we hold, if it is unguarded by God, may be a snare to us; we are liable to come under the power of anything and everything, if God does not keep us. Oh, how needful, then, to do His will, and drive out, in His name, all the inhabitants of the land, i. e., of our hearts, and never, in any degree, put his enemies to tribute. Perhaps making excuses for sin, and calling it by a less severe name, is the most common way of doing this. When the people heard this message of God they wept, and called on the name of the Lord, and for a time all went well.

But "all that generation were gathered unto their fathers, and then arose another generation after them which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which He had done for Israel." But how about their parents? Was their life not a life of continual dealing with God in little things? Did these children of the men who crossed the Jordan on dry land never hear the story from them? Was it not the favorite theme among them, as they grew old and feeble, that they had known the manna in the wilderness, had drunk the water from the solid rock, and had seen the walls of Jericho fall down, and the sun stand still in the heavens when Israel fought against the ten Canaanitish kings? God had commanded that His words should be taught diligently unto their children. (Deut. 6: 7; 11: 19.) Asaph says, "We will not hide them from their children, showing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord, and His strength, and His wonderful works that he hath done. For He established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which He commanded our fathers that they should make them known to their children, ... that they might set their hope in God." and "not be as their fathers—a stubborn and rebellious generation." (Ps. 78: 4-8.) Was it that the fathers did not teach their children, or was it that the children wilfully rejected the teaching of their fathers? We know not. But oh, how we need a prayerful spirit, and the direct guidance of God, in our dealings with our children!

The children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim, and which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods, of the gods of the people that were round about them, and bowed themselves unto them, and provoked the Lord to anger." Oh, how easy it is to succumb to the influence of those whom we see and speak with every day! What love there was in the will of God, that all the inhabitants of the land should be driven out! People around them, who were as gifted and as educated as they, served Baalim, and it was such an easy religion it did not condemn worldliness and lust and passion; they could hold such a religion, and do their own will all the time; other people could be satisfied with this religion, why should not they? It was so inconvenient to have a religion which made them so peculiar, and which led other people to think them such children; how could it matter what religion they had, so that they were only consistent? No doubt some such reasonings were the sops they threw to their own consciences to quiet them, and meanwhile they justified the heathen in their utter ungodliness, and hardened their own hearts against God. The highest thought of many men is, "What religion will suit me?" whereas, the true question is, "What does God, who created me, require of me, His creature? God had prophesied this declension of the people to Moses on his dying day.

Now the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, He delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, as He had declared (Deut. 28: 48), and "into the hands of their enemies round about," as prophesied (Deut. 28: 25; Lev. 26: 17), "so that they could not any longer stand before their enemies." Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as the Lord had said (Deut. 28: 20), and as the Lord had sworn unto them; and they were greatly distressed." Thank God, He would not let them perish unheard. They had sinned with a high hand against Him, but there is no retaliation in God when He punishes; it is "for our profit, that we might be partakers of His holiness." (Heb. 12: 10.) In wrath He remembered mercy. (Hab. 3: 2.) "Nevertheless, the Lord raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of them which spoiled them." But neither wrath nor mercy availed, "Yet they would not hearken unto their judges."

can change the heart of man. Like the demoniac who was possessed of two thousand demons, the heart of man breaks all the fetters and chains which bind it. Nothing but the blood of Christ to cleanse, and the indwelling of Christ by the Holy Ghost to keep Him, will ever make man other than he is; there may be restraining influences, but the old Adam is the old Adam still. "When the Lord raised them up judges, then the Lord was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge; for it repented the Lord because of their groanings by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them." They came for the time under a better influence; there was a passing revival, but after all they were dealing with God second hand, and there was no fundamental change in them. As soon as the judge died, back they were again in their idolatry. Thank God, our Judge and Deliverer "ever liveth to make intercession for us" (Heb. 7: 25); and He has said, Because I live, ye shall live also. (John 14: 19.) Thank God, we are "saved by His life" (Rom. 5: 10), and not by any change in our own nature. God had made ample provision for the people to continue faithful to Him. The pillar of cloud and of fire still abode over the tabernacle, to manifest that God still dwelt among His people; He still spoke by the Urim and Thummim; it only needed that the people should seek unto Him. But the majority of them, while rejoicing in all the gifts which he had bestowed upon them, and luxuriating in the milk and honey and rich products of the land, bore no testimony of gratitude to the God who had dealt so lovingly with them. Corruption increased in the land; each generation became worse than that which preceded it. "They ceased not from nor from their stubborn way." "Their own doings"—this was at the root of the evil. God had destined them to be His people, to live for Him, and bear witness of Him. They despised this vocation, which angels would have wished, and which the only begotten Son of God accepted in after years; they made light of it, and lived as though they were their own. Thus God's anger waxed hot against them, and He declared that He would no longer "drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died"; that He might prove Israel, whether they would keep the way of the Lord or not.

When God cannot do the best thing for us because of our unbelief, He will do the next best. His thought was to drive out the nations from before Israel, and to leave them in undisputed possession of the land, as a light and blessing to the surrounding nations. When, however, He found their tendency to mix with and follow the example of these nations, He gave them their way, until they became a burden to them, and thorns in their sides. Often the truest punishment of a wilful child is to let him take his own way, and bear the consequences; this was God's plan. But during this time, some true servants of God came out of the midst of the confusion and evil which abounded. Othniel served God and his country, and the Spirit of the Lord was upon him. Then the prophetess Deborah arose, and stirred up Barak, at the time when Jabin, King of Canaan, oppressed Israel, and a great deliverance was wrought. It is often in the time of great distress and trouble that God brings out His derelict servants. He never ceases to carry on the education of His children, and the very defection of the many proves the instrument of God to purify the few who stand on God's side amid surrounding unbelief.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

GLADNESS.

Oh why should I be glad? Within my heart
Is sin and folly found.
Within I find no reason for this joy
No safe and proper ground.
I look away from self. To look within is madness,
O Lord make me, I cry, to hear Thy joy, Thy gladness.

I've done no work, nothing to give me jey,
I've found no place of rest
In what I've done. In works of my poor hand,
Not even in my best.
Yet, Thou my Lord, hast made me glad through work Divine,
And Thine own word assures me now that Thine is mine.

Thy work! how great! how wonderful! how free!
How far beyond compare!
The cross, the curse, the death of Christ for me,
Oh love! how pure! how rare!
And though I cannot tell out all that Thou hast done,
I praise in silence for my stubborn heart is won.

"The Lord hath done great things for us; we're glad"
And glad we ought to be.
He took my place. He paid my debt so great,
And gave His Heaven to me.
He'll come for me. He tells me so in His sweet word.
Then all eternity I'll gaze upon my Lord.

And He is glad. When Lazarus died He said:
"I was not there: I'm glad
For your sakes." God will now be glorified
In view of all that's sad.
He raised the dead. He spread His gladness all around.
He's glad. He says there's joy in Heaven o'er lost ones found.

BEYOND

BY HERVEY NEWTON.

"This book, for those who turn their eyes toward the 'land that is far off,' does for the reader what the pen pictures of travellers in the East do for people at home."—Central Baptist, St. Louis.

The author, widely known for his newspaper articles and sketches, has for years made a study of facts concerning the "other world," and finds the known facts respecting the country "Beyond," are full enough to show it superior to the most favored bits of Eden of which this world knows, a real land, with many of the conditions that give this world its charm, with many added features and enjoyable conditions.

An author widely known in the old World and the New, says:

"Those who long for a realizing sense of the joys and occupations of dear ones gone before should read BEYOND. This book is a gem in clearness, purity and brilliancy, a book of fervent devotion, of holy love, and of the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.

Encouragements to Faith.

207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one specially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope many more may be benefitted by it."—Preface.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston Advertiser.

THE LATE DR. WILLIAM R. SUMMERS.

Medical Missionary in Africa from New York.

The Christian Hero—His Work and His Reward—Early Life of Summers—A Restless and Roving Youth—Joins a Circus—Becomes a Conjuror—His Mother's Conversion—Remarkable Instance of the Power of Prayer—The Young Man Driven to his Knees—The Prodigal's Return—His Equipment Sacrificed—Comes to New York—Admitted to College—Develops Brilliant Intellectual Power—Decides to Become a Medical Missionary—Hardships and Triumph—Goes out with Bishop Taylor—His Letters and Death.

ANOTHER valuable life has been laid down on the altar of sacrifice in Africa! One more noble, heroic soldier of the Cross has fallen on the field in the struggle to win the Dark Continent for Christ! Life after life has been spent in that service, and freely given up that the glorious news of salvation might be carried through the unknown regions of that vast continent. Neither riches, nor power, nor fame could come of the labor. Toil, hardship, exposure to pestilential miasma, and danger from fierce savages, who know not what they do—those are what confront the missionary as he enters upon his work. And his reward? Well, there is no reward, as the world estimates rewards. He expects to die a premature death, to leave the world without seeing the victory, to perish probably in some forest or dreary swamp, without one sight of wife or sister or brother to soothe his dying hour, and to lie in an unknown grave. His predecessors have done so, and the very names of some of them are already forgotten. He has but gone to fill for a brief time the gap where they fell, until he too, falls, and another comes to take up the standard his dying hands shall drop, and carry it forward one stage nearer victory. Grand, valiant, self-sacrificing fellows! The world calls them fanatics, smiles contemptuously at their neglect of the main chance, buries itself again in its ledgers, and prostrates itself in worship of the golden calf. The worldling makes his million, lives to old age in luxury, dies in his marble palace, and is buried with pomp: the visionary is cut off in his youth or middle age, dies poor and unnoticed; but he has labored for a Master who never forgets His servants, and the day is coming when from that African swamp his dead body shall rise and stand among those who will shine as stars forever and ever.

His Early Life

gave little promise of the sublime height of martyrdom which Dr. Summers attained. He was born on April 28, 1855, in the Island of Guernsey. He was, therefore, only thirty-three years of age when he died. Some five years ago, when the writer met him in New York, where he was preparing for his work as a medical missionary in Africa, there was about the man an earnest, consecrated, devoted air, which impressed even a stranger with the heroism of the man; but that had come only with the experience of a few years. In his boyhood he was singularly restless and unmanageable. His mother was not a Christian, but her mother was, and she endeavored to lead her little grandson to Christ. Not successfully, however. He had been apprenticed as a boy of fourteen to a job printer, but tired of the occupation. He wanted to see life, and managed to make his way to London, where his agility and dexterous smartness secured him employment in Hengler's circus. A little later, he came in contact with the notorious Dr. Slade, the actual conjurer, but pretended spiritualist. Summers became an adept in the art, and soon surpassed his employer in his tricks of legerdemain. Every consecutive night for four months he exhibited with Slade in the Rotunda in Dublin, and drew large audiences.

His Conversion

was the result of one of those wonderful interpositions of Divine power which should encourage every Christian to unceasing, earnest prayer. In 1876, while he was wandering around, amusing and outwitting the public, and leading a careless, frivolous life, his mother was seized with serious illness. Her physician was the good Dr. George D. Dowkontt, now the devoted and indefatigable head of the International Medical Missionary Society in New York. The Doctor, while ministering to her physical need, did not miss the opportunity to speak of the Great Healer. The woman was deeply moved, became seriously concerned about her state, and at length Dr. Dowkontt had the joy of seeing her saved through Christ. Her first concern, after her own conversion, was about her wandering boy, whose eternal interests she had neglected. She prayed for him constantly, and to Dr. Dowkontt, and other Christian friends, her reiterated request was, "Pray for the conversion of my poor Will." She was so earnest about it that individual and united prayer was offered for him repeatedly.

Young Summers was many miles away engaged in his conjuring performances. He was twenty-two years of age at that time, and was utterly destitute of any inclination toward religion. His own account, given afterward to his friend Dr. Dowkontt, was, that one night, as he was about to retire to rest, he found himself upon his knees. The attitude was a surprise to himself, for prayer had long since ceased to be a habit with him. "Why, Will," he said to himself, "what are you doing, old fellow? You don't believe in anything of this sort: get up, what a fool you are!" Still the young fellow knelt, held down, as it seemed to him, by a power stronger than his own will. It seemed as if he would not be released till he did pray. But he could remember no prayer. There was a little hymn, however, that his memory still held from his childhood's days. So he said it through: "Now I lay me down to sleep," etc., and then he rose and turned into bed. He could not sleep. The Spirit of God was dealing with him in answer to those prayers offered far away. He lost his interest in his occupation, in his pleasures and companions, began to seek earnestly for Christ, and finally the prodigal found his way to home and mother. There he gave himself wholly to God.

Quit of the Old Life

was the determination he took, and he made his surrender final by a decisive act. His conjuring apparatus, which he had taken home with him, had cost him five hundred dollars, and was of an unusually complete character. He gathered it all together one night, and took it to a junk shop, and sold it for what the dealer would give, which was two dollars and fifty cents. The next day he set out to look for work at his old employment as a compositor. Work of that kind was not easy to obtain near home, and after drifting around for some time he made his way to the United States, in September, 1879. Dr. Dowkontt had preceded him, and he gave the young man a cordial welcome. In his search for work he went to Philadelphia, and there began to attend and assist in the meetings of the Salvation Army. They made him a captain, and set him to work at Atlantic City. He proved a very successful worker, but longed for better training and more efficient service. He happened while at Atlantic City to meet with a student from Pennington Seminary, N. J., and by his advice wrote to the Principal of that institution, Dr. Thomas Hanlon, stating his desire for Christian work, his need of education, and his poverty. Dr. Hanlon's heart was drawn toward the young man, and after an interview he was admitted, and set steadily to work. He developed a remarkable and unexpected aptitude for study, and though he was necessarily placed at the bottom of the classes, he worked his way to the head and came out with the first place in the honor-roll.

His Call to Missionary Work

took place while he was in the seminary. Writing to Dr. Dowkontt in December, 1881, he said that he had been led to analyze his abilities and powers, and he had been brought to the conclusion that he could serve God best as a missionary. He even indicated Central Africa as the field to which his mind was drawn. But he said that he had found that the best missionaries for such a field were earnest Christian physicians, and therefore he was anxious to get a medical education. The Medical Missionary Society was then scarcely established, and Dr. Dowkontt could give him little financial help, but the young honor man accepted willingly the post of janitor in the new dispensary at a salary of six dollars a week, and availed himself of every opportunity to become acquainted with the nature of drugs and the practice of medicine. He even slept on the premises that he might save money for a college course, and give a portion of his nights to the study of medical books. After a course of study under Dr. Dowkontt, he succeeded in obtaining a scholarship in the University Medical College of New York, and so assiduously did he labor that in March, 1884, he passed his final examination, and was awarded his coveted prize, the M. D. diploma.

An Introduction to Bishop Taylor was secured through Dr. Hanlon and that great organizer soon perceived that a genuine prize had fallen into his hands. Dr. Summers had studied every book he could obtain on Africa, and was just the man William Taylor needed for his new enterprise. Dr. Summers was ordained on October 21, 1884, and, accompanied by Mr. Heli. Chatelain, a young Swiss student, set sail the next day in the steerage of the Aurania. They travelled first to Berlin, where, under Lieutenant Weissman, the eminent German explorer, they gained some knowledge of the dialects of the tribes in Central Africa. On January 7, 1885, they sailed with Bishop Taylor for Africa. Arriving in Liberia, the Bishop remained there to meet his party, who were to sail a month later. Dr. Summers and his companion, Chatelain, went on to Loanda, where they arrived in the middle of the following month. After reconnoitring in Loanda, making friends, and securing a house for the expected party of missionaries, Dr. Summers set out alone for the interior, accomplishing a journey of 400 miles to Melange, and returned to the coast, having opened up the way for the various stations since located there.

The Work in Africa

now commenced in earnest. Dr. Summers remained at Melange about one year, healing, teaching, and preaching the gospel. During this time he so won the hearts of the people by his kindness and medical skill that they were terribly grieved when they first heard of his intended departure from them, on a journey of over one thousand miles to the further side of the Congo. He considered, however, that the work might safely be left, as another missionary would arrive shortly, and he was anxious to press on farther inland, to the point at which, as he believed, missionary operations ought to find their centre. He at length succeeded in tearing himself away, and the people loaded him with gifts, provided him with carriers and the necessaries for his journey. Thus equipped, Dr. Summers set out on his perilous expedition amid tears and good wishes. After a terrible journey of six months, during which the Doctor's life was often saved as by miracle, he reached Luluaburg, on the Kassai River, in safety in December, 1886. Here he remained, busy attending to the needs of the people, many of whose lives he saved, and trying to teach them the "Way of life." With a view of doing this more completely he was busy preparing a grammar and vocabulary of their language.

His Letters from Luluaburg were full of interesting details of his journey thither and his work after his arrival. In the first, dated August 31, 1887, he reported himself in good health; in the second, dated January 3, 1888, he said he was just recovering from a five weeks' illness, in which he had suffered from pleurisy, septic fever, and an ill-defined but painful lung disease.

"On most of the way from Malange to Kassai," said Dr. Summers, "the country is wild and the population meagre. We suffered from hunger, the people not having food for themselves—as at best they plant but little more than they expect to consume. To the east of the Kassai everything changed for the better The country was, for the most part, park-like; cut up from three to five times each day's journey by deep-cut and swift-flowing streams; no swamps; hills covered with the oil-palm and dotted with pretty and regularly built towns. I am continually beset by chiefs, who and teachers. Every chief wants one. In some places I have had difficulty in leaving the towns, the chiefs crying, and begging me to remain. At one place, near the source of the Mwansangomma River, the chief covered himself with pemba, and came crying for me to remain.

"Another chief, Mwamba Mputto, was, with his people, overjoyed at my arrival. He begged me to stay, said he wanted his people to become like white men, that he 'had been expecting me for a long time,' etc. I said that I could not possibly remain, as I must first await the steamer, and that then I would perhaps come back, or some one else would probably come. The chief cried like a child, and said he was sure the white man would come at some time, and that he 'had built a house' for the purpose; that it would be in perfect readiness in a few days. This is in a heathen, but does not speak half of the wonderful desire that the people are continuously expressing for the missionary and teacher. It seems to me that God is preparing a people here for the reception of the Gospel on a grand scale, and that these Bashilange will help to solve the problem of evangelization of great stretches of this part of Central Africa.

"The chances of years of service on the part of missionaries are perhaps better here than in any part of Africa. The climate I consider decidedly healthy. There is but little fever, and that not of a bad character, being generally simple intermittent. Swampy land is scarce. Food is very abundant.

"I have to praise God for many wonderful blessings and providential deliverances. I find that 'the great loving heart of Jesus' is just as near as (if not nearer than) it was in Europe or America; and His 'Lo, I am with you always,' tones down all annoyances, makes loneliness companionable, and converts despondency into lively hope."

His Death,

as we stated last week, has been briefly announced to Dr. Dowkontt, without particulars as to date, place, or cause.. There is, however, reason to believe, from the intimation given in the letter referred to above that he must have died of consumption developed by exposure and hardship. While we grieve for his loss, we have no fear for his work. Some brave, consecrated, young man will take that up and carry it forward. God is raising up young men all around ready to give their lives to this grand enterprise. Dr. Dowkontt has several such men now in training who are studying medicine, and until they can go out to Africa, are healing, and preaching the gospel, among the poor of New York. He could have many more, had he only the funds necessary for their support while they study. Any help that can be given to the earnest, self-sacrificing man who is thus recruiting for the army of the Lord will be well rendered. His address is, Dr. George D. Dowkontt, 118 East 45th Street, New York.

The Illustrations

on the first page are of figures and scenes which must have been among the last on which the eyes of Dr. Summers rested. The scene under the portrait is the Lake Vivi, the two figures to the right are a man and woman of the Congo country, drawn from life by an artist in the Stanley expedition; the picture on the right of them is of a house of the better class at Undunga. The lower panels commencing on the left represents a view from the Station at Isanghila, types of heads of the natives of Mabunga, and a Banyala woman.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS

Living with a Cobra.—Rev. T. Heelis, of Dowlaishwarum, India, writes: "I am living in my boat, and with me a cobra has been living for some days: I saw part of its body, some days ago, and suspected that it was of that class, but as one of my men said that it must be of a harmless species, I did not trouble about it, thinking that I would put my foot on its head when I had an opportunity. Yesterday one of the men, in taking firewood from the stern, found the cast-off slough of the snake, and pronounced it to be that of a cobra. I half filled the boat with water, but the snake must have escaped, as it could not be found anywhere. Before getting to sleep last night I was very sensitive to sound, but did not dream that a cobra was on the table, head erect, hood extended, and looking at me with its wicked little eyes. Persuading myself that the snake was venomless, calmed my fears, but such false peace would have been valueless if I had been bitten by the reptile. The Lord in His infinite mercy preserved me."

An Irish Steward's Mother-Wit.—A Minister says: "A steward was one day engaged in cleaning the silver-plate used in the cabin. He did not notice that he was standing in a very dangerous position until, the vessel giving a lurch, he was almost thrown overboard; and, in order to save himself, he had to let the piece of plate he was polishing go, and it fell overboard. He was in great distress, knowing that the captain would be very angry; but, being an Irishman, he resolved to put the best face on it possible, and, summoning his mother-wit to his aid, he went to the captain, who, observing his rueful face, said: 'Well, Terry, what's wrong?' 'Captain, sir,' said the steward, 'is a thing lost when you know where it is?' 'No, Terry; why do you ask such a stupid question?' the captain asked. 'Then, sir, the silver plate is not lost; it is at the bottom of the sea.' The captain knew he would never see it again; but some Christians think that though God has cast their sins into the depths of the sea, they may, at any moment, again confront and condemn them. We who know where they are, remember them; but, thank God, if He has pardoned them, they will never again appear against us."

The King's Highway and the Moor.—A Highland boy who lived in a very quiet out-of-the-way spot, was on one occasion sent to the nearest village, a good distance over the hills, to get some medicine from the doctor. The lad had never been there before, but he had often heard his father and mother speak of the village and the different ways to it. For in that place was the district church, to which they went every third Sabbath, the minister of that district having three churches, and speaking in each of them by turn. From this cotter's home there were two ways, both of which led to the village. One a broad, undefined way over the moors, and the other the highway, well enclosed, and kept in order, and upon which were the milestones. Before setting out on his errand the boy asked his father which of the ways he should take. 'Take the highway my son, for in it you cannot go astray,' was his father's reply. Similarly there is before every one in this world two ways, one the broad waste that leads to destruction, and the other the narrow, well kept, king's highway, wherein pilgrims cannot go astray, and along which we find many milestones, all showing we are still keeping in the way."

A Whisky Bottle in the Death-Bed.—"There was a woman who came to this hall, and I am sure if I have spoken to her once I have spoken to her scores of times about her soul! and yet she did not come to Christ. Sometimes I went away rejoicing, thinking that she had nearly, if not already, come to Christ. At other times I would come away sad, to think that all our efforts had been in vain. Friends of the supposed convert came from a distance and thanked God for the work that was going on, but I replied, 'Yes, I can thank God for the great work that He is doing here, and for many other things, but I do not think I can yet thank Him for that woman's conversion.' 'Why?' they inquired, in surprise. 'Because I can never believe in conversion when I constantly smell strong drink in her breath.' And circumstances but too soon and too fully justified my suspicions. She was taken ill and died. A Christian worker visiting her found in the room in which she had died a number of whisky bottles, mostly empty, but some in various stages of fullness, stuffed into every conceivable corner, and one bottle was actually in the bed in which she died. Like a legion of devils, they had devoured the poor woman's body and soul, and the love of drink had kept her from accepting Christ."

The Austrians Unexpectedly Routed.—Mr. Hamilton relates: "It is related of Napoleon I., that when opposing the Austrians in Italy, he sent one of his generals, Descroix, away upon a certain expedition, and not long afterwards found himself obliged to fight the whole Austrian army. The French fought long and bravely, but everything was against them, and they were obliged to retreat. The Austrians were elated; their general retired to his tent to send a glowing account of his victory to Vienna; but while so engaged he was surprised to hear firing, and, rushing out, found his own army retreating before the lately conquered French. How was it? Descroix had, when on the march, heard the furious firing of the cannon, and knowing that Napoleon was much the weaker, had without waiting for orders marched his men back again, and arrived in time to find his general retreating from the field. As they approached each other, Napoleon said, 'We have lost one battle, but there is time yet to-day to win another.' And turning his men, he again attacked the Austrians, and completely routed them. Some people seem to think if they be once beaten there is no hope for them; but if Satan once beat you, try again. Christ is never out of reach of your prayer, and the instant it strikes His ear He will hasten to your rescue."

A Collier's Last Revel.—Mr. Climie Said: "I was once preaching among the colliers, and the Lord was blessing my efforts in their midst; but there was one young fellow in whom I felt a special interest, and longed to bring him to Christ. I remember meeting him on one occasion, and asked him to come to Christ, and to come to the meeting, where he would hear more about Him; but he would not come. New Year's Day approached; he must get his bottle filled with whisky, like the other fellows. He said he was going to keep New Year's Day; but that day got hold of him, and held him until his pockets were empty and his head sore. When he came to himself he saw his error, and resolved to accept Christ. At the next meeting I saw him in the front seat. At the close, when I went up to him and placed my hand upon his shoulder, he was shaking like a leaf 'What do you think, James; would it not be good to have a word of prayer?' I asked. He willingly knelt with me, and after I had led in prayer, he also prayed, 'O Lord, send light from heaven into my poor, dark heart!' Dropping again upon his knees, he clasped his hands, and exclaimed, 'O Lord, Thy Book says, "Whosoever"; I come to Thee as one of the whosoevers. Lord, take me; I give myself to Thee!' He left that meeting a new man, trusting in Christ, who has kept him from that day to this."

AN OBNOXIOUS DIET.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday, November 25, 1888.

"And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls: . . . the owl, the vulture, and the bat. . . . These also shall be unclean unto you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth: . . . the chameleon and the snail." Lev. 11: 13-30.

THE Bible offers every possible variety of theme, of argument, and of illustration. We care not much in what kind of a pitcher the water of life is brought, if it is only the clear, pure water. God gave the ancients a list of the animals that they might eat, and a list of animals that they might not eat. These people lived in a hot climate, and certain forms of animal food corrupted their blood, and disposed them to scrofulous disorders, depraved their appetites, and bemeaned their souls. A man's food, when he has the means and opportunity of selecting it, suggests his moral nature. The reason the wild Indian is as cruel as the lion is because he has food that gives him the blood of the lion. A missionary among the Indians says that, by changing his style of food to correspond with theirs, his temperament was entirely changed. There are certain that have a tendency to affect the moral nature. Many a Christian is trying to do by prayer that which cannot be done except through corrected diet. For instance, he who uses swine's flesh for constant diet will be diseased in body and polluted of soul—all his liturgies and catechisms notwithstanding. The Gadarene swine were possessed of the devil, and ran down a steep place into the sea, and all the swine ever since seem to have been similarly possessed. In Leviticus, God struck this meat off the table of His people, and placed before them a bill of fare at once healthful, nutritious, and generous.

But, higher than this physical reason, there was a spiritual reason why God chose certain forms of food for the ancients. God gave a peculiar diet to his people, not only because he wanted them to be distinguished from the surrounding nations, but because certain birds and animals, by reason of their habits, have been Suggestive of Moral Qualities.

By the list of things from which they were to abstain, God wished to prejudice their minds against certain evils; and, in the list of lawful things given, he wished to suggest certain forms of good. When God solemnly forbade His people to eat the owl, the vulture, the bat, the chameleon, and the snail, He meant to drive out of His people all the sins that were thus emblemized.

I take the suggestion of the text, and say that one of the first unclean things the Christian needs to drive out of his soul is

The Owl.

The owl is the melancholy bird of night. It hatches out whole broods of superstitions. It is doleful and hideous. When it sings, it sings through its nose. It loves the gloom of night better than the brightness of the day. Who has not slept in the cabin near the woods, and been awakened in the night by the dismal "too-hoo" of the owl? Melancholy is the owl that is perched in many a Christian soul. It is an unclean bird, and needs to be driven away. A man whose sins are pardoned, and who is on the road to heaven, has no right to be gloomy. He says: "I have so many doubts." That is because "you are lazy." Go actively to work in Christ's cause, and your doubts will vanish. You say: "I have lost my property"; but I reply: "You have infinite treasures laid up in heaven." You say: "I am weak and sickly, and going to die." Then be congratulated that you are so near eternal health and perpetual gladness. Catch a few morning larks for your soul, and stone this owl off your premises.

As a little girl was eating, the sun dashed upon her spoon, and she cried: "Oh, mamma, I have swallowed

A Spoonful of Sunshine!"

Would God that we might all indulge in the same beverage! Cheerfulness—it makes the homeliest face handsome; it makes the hardest mattress soft; it runs the loom that weaves buttercups and rainbows and auroras. God made the grass black? No: that would be too sombre. God made the grass red? No: that would be too gaudy. God made the grass green, that by this parable all the world might be led to a subdued cheerfulness. Read your Bible in the sunshine. Remember that your physical health is closely allied to your spiritual. The heart and the liver are only a few inches apart, and what affects one affects the other. A historian records that by the sound of great laughter in Rome, Hannibal's assaulting army was frightened away in retreat. And there is in the great outbursting joy of a Christian soul that which can drive back any infernal besiegement. Rats love dark closets, and Satan loves to burrow in a gloomy soul. "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous! and again I say, rejoice!"

Hoist the window of your soul in this the 12 o'clock of your spiritual night. Put the gun to your shoulder, and aim at the black jungle from which the hooting comes, pull the trigger, and drop that croaking, loathsome, hideous owl of religious melancholy into the bushes.

Again: taking the suggestion of the text,

Drive out the Vulture

from your soul. God would not allow the Jews to eat it. It lives on carcases; it fattens among the dead; with leaden wing it circles about battle-fields. Wilson, the American ornithologist, counted two hundred and thirty-seven vultures around one carcase. If crossing the desert when there is no sign of wing in the air a camel perish out of the caravan, immediately the air begins to darken with vultures. There are many professed Christians who have a vulture in their souls. They prey upon the character and feelings of others. A doubtful reputation is a banquet for them. Some rival in trade or profession falls, and the vulture puts out its head. These people revel in the details of a man's ruin. They say: "I told you so!" They rush into some store and say: "Have you heard the news? Just as I expected! Our neighbor has gone all to pieces! Good for him!"

That professedly Christian woman, having heard of the wrong-doing of some sister in the church, instead of hiding the sin with a mantle of charity, peddles it all along the streets. She takes the afternoon to make her long-neglected calls. She before sundown, and every time tells it larger. She rushes into the parlors to tell it, and into the nursery to tell it, and into the kitchens to tell it. She says: "Would you have thought it! Well, I always said there was something wrong about her. Why, I should not speak to her if I saw her in the street. Is it not horrible? But better not say anything about it, because there may be some mistake. I do not want my name involved in the matter. I guess I will just go over and ask them at No. 263 whether they have heard it. Guess it must be so, for Mary Ann says that her husband saw a man who heard from his business partner that his blind old grandmother had seen something that looked very suspicious!"

The most loathsome, miserable, God-forsaken wretch on earth is a gossip. I can tell her on the street, though I have never seen her before. She walks fast, and has her bonnet-strings loose, for she has not had time to tie them since she heard that last scandal. She looks both ways as she passes, hoping to see new evidences of depravity in the windows. I think that when Satan has a job so infinitely mean that in all the pit he cannot find a devil mean enough to do it, and all bribes and threats have failed to get one willing for the infernal crusade, he says to one of his sergeants: "Go up to Brooklyn, and in such a street, on such a corner, get and she will be glad to do it." And sure enough, like a hungry fish, she takes the hook in her mouth, and Satan slackens the line, and lets her run out farther and farther, until after a while he says: "It is time to haul in that line," and with a few strong pulls he brings her to the beach of fire. What do you say? That she was a member of the church? I cannot help that. When Satan goes a-fishing, he does not care what school the fish belongs to, whether it is a Presbyterian mackerel or an Episcopalian salmon. Amidst the thunder-crash of Sinai God said: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." And in Leviticus He says: "Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer."

Take not into your ear that scum of hell that people call tittle-tattle. Whosoever willingly listens to a slander is equally guilty with the one who tells it, and an old writer says they ought both to be hung, the one by the tongue and the other by the ear. Do not smile upon such a spaniel, lest, like a pleased dog, he puts his dirty paw upon you. Throw back the shutter of your soul, oh Christian men and women! and see if there be within you a vulture with filthy talons and cruel beak. Let not this unclean thing roost in your soul, for my text says: "Ye shall hold in abomination the vulture."

Drive Out the Bat

from your soul. No wonder God set this bird among the unclean. It is an offence to every one. Let it fly into the window of a summer night, and all the hands, young and old, are against it. It is half bird, half mouse. It seems made partly to walk and partly to fly, and does neither well, and becomes an emblem of those Christians who try to cling to earth and heaven at the same time. They want to walk on earth in worldliness, and yet fly toward heaven in spirituality; and their soul, between feet and wings, is constantly perplexed. Oh, my brethren, be one thing or the other! Choose the world, if you prefer it, and see how many dollars you can win, and how much applause you can gain, and how large a business you can establish, and how grand a house you can build, and how fast a span of horses you can drive. You may be prospered until you can fail for five hundred thousand dollars, instead of having the disgrace of failing for only ten thousand, as some unenterprising people do. It is quite a reward to be able for ten or twenty years to be called one of or Boston; and then, to make your fortune last as long as possible, we will give you a splendid funeral, and you shall have twenty-five carriages following you, with somebody in the most of them, and your coffin shall have silver handles on the sides, and we will mourn for you in splendid pocket-handkerchiefs bound with crape, and with bombazine twenty full yards long trailing half across the parlor, so that all the company may stand upon it, and we will write our letters for the next six months on paper edged with black. But, my friends, your worldly fortunes will not last. I will buy out now all that you will be worth in worldly estate seventy-five years from now. I have the money in my pocket with which to do it. Here it is! Two cents! It is a large sum to offer for all you will possess at the close of seventy-five years. Choose the world, if you want to; but if not, then choose heaven. That estate lies partly on this side of the river, but mostly on the other. It is ever accumulating. The prospect of it makes one independent of earthly misfortunes; so that Rogers, the martyr, slept so soundly the night before his burning, that they violently shook him in order to get him awake in time for the execution; and Paul exults at the thought of the "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Oh, Choose Earth or Heaven!

Make up your mind whether you will walk in earthly joys, or fly with heavenly expectations. Be not a bat, fit neither to walk nor fly, having just enough of heaven to spoil the world, and so much of the world as to spoil heaven. Christ says that your present condition nauseates Him to positive sickness: "Because thou art neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of My mouth!" In the ruins of Pompeii there was found a petrified woman, who, instead of trying to fly from the destroyed city, had spent her time in gathering up her jewels. She saved neither her life nor her jewels. There are multitudes making the same mistake. In trying to get earth and heaven, they lose both. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." Be one thing or the other. Tread the earth like a lion, or mount the air like the eagle; for my text says: "Ye shall have in abomination among the fowls the bat."

Again: taking the suggestion of the text,

Drive out the Chameleon from your soul. There is some difference among good men as to the name of this creeping thing which God pronounced unclean, but I shall take the opinion which seems best suited to my purpose. The chameleon is a reptile, chiefly known by its changeableness of color, taking the color of the thing next to it, sometimes brown, sometimes red, and sometimes gray, but always the color of its surroundings, a type of that class of Christians who are now one thing in religious faith, and now another, just to suit circumstances, always taking their color of religious belief from the man they are talking to. They go to one place, and are first-rate Unitarians. "Jesus was a good man, but nothing more." They go to Princeton, and they are Trinitarians, almost willing to die for the divinity of Jesus. Among the Universalists they refuse the idea of future punishment; and, going among those of opposite belief, announce that there is a hell with a gusto that makes you think they are glad of it. Drive out that unclean chameleon from your soul. Do not be ever changing the color of your faith. My friends, Liberal Christianity, falsely so-called,

Believes in Nothing.

God is anything you want to make Him. The Bible to be believed, in so far as you like it. Heaven a grand mixing up of Neros and Pauls. The man who dies by suicide in his right mind in 1888, beating into glory by ten years the Christian man who dies a Christian death in 1898—the suicide proving himself wiser than the Christian. Oh, my friends, let us try to believe in something! An infidel was called to the bedside of his daughter. The daughter said: "Father, which shall I believe, you or mother? Mother took the religion of Christ, and died in its embrace. You say that religion is a humbug. Now I am going to die, and I am very much perplexed; shall I believe you, or take the belief of my mother?" The father said: "Choose for yourself." She said: "No; I am too weak to choose for myself; I want you to choose for me." "Well," said the father, after much hesitation and embarrassment: "Mary, I think you had better take the religion of your mother." The time will come when we shall have to believe something. We can not afford to be

On the Fence in Religion.

Truth and error are set opposite to each other. The one is infinitely right, and the other infinitely wrong. In the Judgment-day we must give an account of what we believed as well as for what we acted. The difference between believing truth and believing error is the difference between paradise and perdition. I beg you, in the light of the Bible, and on your knees before God, to form your religious opinion and then stick to it, though business companions scoff, and wits caricature, and the air crackles with the fires of martyrdom. Surely truths in behalf of which Christ died, and angels of God trooped forth, and the whole universe is marshaled, are worth living for and worth dying for. Amidst the most unclean things is this ever-changing chameleon of religious theory. Away with the reptile! God abhors it with an all-consuming abhorrence.

Once more: taking the suggestion of the text, from your soul. God has declared it unclean. It is an animal to be found everywhere between the coldest north and the hottest south. There are fifteen hundred species of the snail. They have no backbone, and they are so slow that their movement is almost imperceptible. You see a snail in one place to-day; go to-morrow and you will find it has advanced only a few inches. It becomes an emblem of that large class of Christian people who go to work with a slowness and sluggishness that is wonderful. They are stopped by every little obstacle, because, like the snail, they have no backbone. Others mount up on eagle's wings, but they go at a snail's pace.

Oh child of God, arouse! We have apotheosized Prudence and Caution long enough. Prudence is a beautiful grace, but of all the family of Christian graces I like her the least, for she has so often been Married to Laziness.

Sloth, and Stupidity. We have a million idlers in the Lord's vineyard, who pride themselves on their prudence. "Be prudent," said the disciples to Christ, "and stay away from Jerusalem"; but He went. "Be prudent," said Paul's friends, "and look out for what you say to Felix"; but he thundered away until the ruler's knees knocked together. In the eyes of the world, the most imprudent men that ever lived were Martin Luther, and John Oldcastle, and Wesley, and Knox. My opinion is, that the most imprudent and reckless thing is to stand still. It is well to hear our Commander's voice when he says "Halt!" but quite as important to hear it when he says "Forward!" This Gospel ship, made to plough the sea at fifteen knots an hour, is not making three. Sometimes it is most prudent to ride your horse slowly, and pick out the way for his feet, and not strike him with the spurs; but when a band of Shoshone Indians are after you in full tilt, the most prudent thing for you to do is to plunge in the rowels and put your horse to a full run, shouting "Go 'long!" until the Rocky Mountains echo it. The foes of God are pursuing us. The world, the flesh, and the devil are after us; and our wisest course is to go ahead at swiftest speed.

When the Church of God gets to advancing too fast, it will be time enough to use caution. No need of putting on the brakes while going up-hill. Do not let us sit down waiting for something "to turn up," but go ahead in the name of God, and turn it up.

The Great Danger to the Church

now is not sensation, but stagnation. Oh that the Lord God would send a host of aroused and consecrated men to set the Church on fire, and to turn the world upside down. Let us go to work and catch the last snail in our souls. With Divine vehemence let us stamp its life out: for my text declares: "These also shall be unclean to you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the chameleon and the snail."

I have thus tried to prejudice these Christian men and women against gloominess, and slander, and half-and-half experiences, and changeableness, and sloth. Our opportunities for getting better are being rapidly swallowed up in the remorseless past. This moment may we drive out all the unclean things from our souls—the vulture, and the bat, and the owl, and the chameleon, and the snail; and in place thereof bring in the Lamb of God, and the Dove of the Spirit! The case is urgent. Arouse! before it be eternally too late! "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it!"

THE Rev. R. F. Guyton, the veteran Baptist missionary at Delhi, India, says: "The photograph (from which the picture on page 215 is engraved) was taken on Christmas Day, 1887. Our gathering on that day is always of great interest, not only to ourselves, but also to all the brethren connected with the Mission. They are scattered very widely during the year, and rejoice to come together at the close to greet those who are joined with them in faith and labor. Some came nearly forty miles to join in the day's service of thanksgiving. The engraving shows a part—somewhat less than a third—of the congregation met on Christmas morning. Among them are some of our most trusted native helpers.

"Others are there who are not so well known, because they are younger men, but who have already greatly helped us, and who will yet, we trust, help us still more devotedly. Saul David, our native doctor and excellent helper, Silas Paul, John of Sabzi Mandi, Yaqúb, Joseph, Paul, and many others. On the right of the picture are a few women, wives of our native Christians, Bible women, and girls of the boarding-school. Two of these are now studying medicine in Lahore.

"The room in which they are met is the Lower Hall of the Native Training Institution. The training classes are held in the rooms above. This hall is now regularly used as the native chapel, where services are held on Sunday and Friday. On this occasion it was adorned by flags and banners made by ladies of the Mission. One of the banners is seen on the centre pillar, bearing the text, 'Grace for grace.' Others which you do not see have the texts 'From strength to strength,' 'From glory to glory,' &c., &c. Around the upper bands of the pillars are painted other texts, and along the line of the arches are painted the 103d and 24th Psalms, and about thirty pictures.

THE RESULT OF A RUINED BUSINESS.

A YOUNG man named Ah-song, who is assisting the missionaries at Shao-hing, in China, recently told a remarkable story to Miss Carpenter. She says: "It is several years since he was converted, and his life has since then been singularly consistent and devoted. At morning and evening prayers it was most cheering to see how thoroughly he enjoyed God's precious Word. One evening, as we got up from our knees, Ah-song said, 'I have proved that God has been good to me.' When I asked how he had proved it, he answered, 'Soon after I became a Christian, my business failed. I was willing to starve myself, but could not help being troubled about my mother. She with all my other friends said if I would but give up the foreign religion the trade would be good again. I knew that Jesus was my Saviour, and I could not give Him up. At last I was obliged to close the shop, and go home to my own village. But I soon found my needs supplied. When I had the opportunity of preaching the gospel to my relations I did so, and very soon was rejoiced to hear that my mother had accepted Jesus; in a short time two other relations were converted, and an old lady who was living in the next house. This old lady was taken ill soon after I went to live in the village, and said it was all owing to my having become a Christian, but I told her what Jesus had done for me, and that He was only waiting to save and bless her too, if she would but believe in Him. A few Sundays after she had a sedan-chair brought, and was carried from her bed to the chapel where I was preaching. The following Sunday she also went, and took a young woman with her. Soon she found my words were true, and Jesus became as precious to her as He was to me.' This old lady is now one of the brightest witnesses in the place. Ah-song ended by saying, 'If God had not made my business to fail, I should not have gone to live near my relations, and they would not have heard the gospel. It is worth hundreds of dollars to me to know that they are now rejoicing in Jesus as their Saviour.'"

ROUGHING IT IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

A Night's Combat with Mosquitoes—Twenty-five Miles from Shelter at Midnight—Remarkable Discovery of an Abandoned Bedstead—a Loan of Bed and Pillows—Sickness in an Indian Cabin—Filth and Vermin—An Indian School-House Built—An Appeal for Teachers—Welcome Gifts.

A FEW incidents from a letter recently received from Mrs. Re Qua, who, as our readers are aware, is with her husband, the Rev. W. F. Re Qua, working for Christ among the Indians in the Indian Territory, will give some idea of the kind of life such labor involves. That two Christian persons should give up a comfortable home, an assured income, and the society of their friends, to go out to preach Christ, braving hardships and depending for support on God alone, is an evidence of what faith in God and love for souls can do in a consecrated heart.

Mrs. Re Qua says: "During the latter part of the summer and fall we have travelled many, many miles, over the roughest kind of roads, sleeping sometimes in our small tent, and sometimes in less comfortable quarters. Once riding till after dark, going to an appointment for meeting, we camped in our wagon in what soon proved to be the headquarters of an army of hostile and bloodthirsty mosquitoes. They assailed every available square inch of epidermis in multitudes; their size, by the light of our lantern, showing three times that of the ordinary domestic grade; and spite of our all-night's defensive vigilance, we carried numerous marks of their cruel stings for days. Little Beatrice suffered more than we did.

"Again, deceived in the length and badness of a road, we found ourselves, after travelling forty miles (the utmost limit for our ponies and ourselves), at 9 o'clock in the evening, twenty-five miles from a resting-place, and without any provision for the night. We tried to get shelter in a wayside cabin, but were refused. Then, driving under a cluster of trees a short distance from the road, we resigned ourselves to spending a chilly night in a buggy, when lo! we spied a bedstead some one had made and left under the trees, and close by, a man was camped in a wagon with his wife. They became aware of our situation, and brought out from their store a feather-bed, pillows, and two or three comforters, saying they had plenty without them. How thankful we were for this bed spread in the wilderness!

"Two weeks ago we spent a day among the Indian families several miles from here; their log-cabins are all without windows, and are comfortless in the extreme; though I suppose they please their occupants much better than they would people accustomed to homes so different in every way. In one of these huts a poor woman held a young infant in her arms, whose little purple limbs she ineffectually tried to cover with its scanty rags. Near by, in front of a corn-shed, upon a rude bench, lay a very sick woman. The ground was covered with filth and vermin indescribable, and was overrun with the usual number of dogs and pigs. In the midst of which a little rough table was spread with the inevitable greasy black pork and corn-meal cake, the staple diet of these forest dwellers, but repulsive to the last degree to one accustomed to other fare. Some little girls grinned a perpetual welcome to us, while a half-grown boy made himself conspicuous in a single scanty garment. Our business was to minister, which we did in the wisest way we knew.

"One week ago we rode out eight or ten miles to hold a service among the Indians. We found quite a large number collected; the women, mostly barefoot, in ill-made calico dresses, and red bandana kerchiefs twisted, not ungracefully, around their heads. At this place Mr. Re Qua has induced them to build a log school-house, and they are now adding another log building for the residence of a teacher. The teacher, a young lady from N. Y. State, who is spending a few weeks with us, waiting the completion of her home and the arrival of her clothing, etc., accompanied us that day. After the service, perhaps a dozen Indian women consulted together; then one of them, who could speak a little English, came to the teacher, and said, 'Me can't read, me want learn.' I said, 'Do the other women want to learn too?' She answered, 'Yes, all.' We told them all to come, and they should be taught, not only to read, but many other things. They went away very happy. It is surprising how few, even of the civilized (?) Choctaws, can read, write, or speak English. Of course, one occasionally meets an educated Indian, generally a girl who has been sent to the States for an education. These are sufficient to prove that there is ground for believing that these people are capable of profiting by an education; but at present the condition of the bulk of the Indians we have seen is deplorable."

Our two heroic friends have been cheered by many gifts from the readers of this journal. Mr. Re Qua asks us to acknowledge here those he received during the month of September last. They are: Mrs. O. Greenleaf, Ill., $2; "A Friend," Conn., $5; Mr. L. Leach, Ia., 50c.; "An S. S.," per Dr. Speicher, Ia., $6; Mr. C. W. D. Jones, Ill., $2. Mr. Re Qua's address is McAlister, Ind. Ter.

A DESERTED CHINESE CITY.

IN an extended tour in the Island of Hainan, China, Dr. C. C. Jerimiassen, a Fresbyterian missionary, came upon a suggestive spectacle. In a letter to the Church he thus describes it: "Sang hoe Kang is the harbor port of the city of Sang hoe, which is about two miles inland. The harbor is very small, only capable of holding eight or ten junks. It is a great resort for fishermen. During certain seasons of the year they come with their families and put up straw houses on the sandy beach, while they salt and dry their fish, which is taken away by junks to all parts of the mainland. When I arrived there was quite a large straw village, containing not less than sixty or seventy houses. We left at once for the city. Sang hoe is a district city, and has the best-preserved wall of any of the cities I entered, but the city itself might almost be said to have ceased to exist. It reminds me very much of Jerusalem, of which it was said there should not be 'left one stone upon another.' All that is now left of the city is about fifty houses toward the south and east gates, whilst all the remaining part is in ruins. It is said to have been a very prosperous city until fifteen or twenty years ago, since which time it has gradually fallen away, until nothing but a heap of ruins remains. Even the civil and military heads of the district live in hired houses, and all that is to be seen of their yamens is a heap of brick, and the large granite pillars with inscriptions which still stand as a kind of tombstone to remind coming generations of what has been. A new city has lately been built a few miles off, where new residences have been prepared for the civil and military heads, but ghosts or evil spirits are said to have taken possession of the houses; so, of course, there is no room for the officials, who are constantly left out in the cold."

SAVED FROM THE GRAVE.

A SALESMAN in a dry-goods house in New York was dangerously sick. The agony from which he suffered grew so excruciating that he could not doubt that death was upon him. He summoned a lawyer and had a simple will drawn up and signed. Then, calling his landlady, he gave directions for his funeral and the disposal of a few personal belongings. Everything was now arranged, and the man saw, as he believed, the last person leave the room whom he would ever see in this world. The remaining hours—or it might be only minutes—of his life should be spent in communion with God. He felt that he had done with the world completely, and whatever time was left was consecrated to God. He composed himself to think and pray, but to his astonishment, after a short time the intense agony left him. As he cast off all hope of life, cut himself loose from the world, and counted himself as one already dead, new life and vigor entered his frame. Whether he was in or out of the body he could not tell; but this he knew, that the most glorious ecstatic realization of the Divine presence filled his soul, and there was in his body an abundant energy and vitality. At length he began te realize that a wondrous change must have taken place akin to the miraculous. He was awed as Jacob was at Bethel (Gen. 28:16), when he said, "Surely God was in this place and I knew it not." But he felt that his was a purchased, a consecrated life, not his own henceforth. He entered the ministry, and is now being used of God in the conversion of many souls.

WOMAN'S WORK IN INDIA.

THIRTY-FIVE schools are now established in Cawnpore and its environs under the superintendence of lady missionaries. Miss Ward, who is engaged in this work, writes in a letter to the Missionary Link a most encouraging account of the progress and prospects of the enterprise. She says: "In one of our Brahmin homes a Hindu priestess is learning to read. One day the missionary was giving a Bible lesson, and the children about were making some noise. The priestess said, 'Be quiet and listen; few speak such words to us as how Christ left Heaven, and suffered for us. How much He must have loved us, and yet we love Him so little, and forget so often about Him. I want to come and listen all day to such words.' Yes it is the Christ-love that draws humanity to Him. These instances help us, and give us faith to go on with our work.

"I was examining lately one of the schools, and I was pleased with it as I heard the recitation of Bible verses, and the ready answers to the questions in a simple catechism. You will be glad to know that truths are stored up in the minds of the children, ready to be taken into the hearts by the Holy Spirit, at some future time, how or when we may not know till we meet on the other shore. Three of the girls read with me from a translation of 'Bible Stories,' a chapter on the history of Joseph, and were much interested. I questioned them on the preceding lessons, and found they had a good knowledge of them. These girls have read two of the Gospels, and can now read the Bible understandingly. I always feel a great step is taken when this is done, for then the pupil can search for herself, if she will. In one school taught by a Mahommedan woman the children are improving. I visited them a few days ago, and saw her sitting on the mat, with her little group around her. Most of the schools have native teachers, but are closely superintended by ourselves."

CHINESE RETRIBUTION.

THE Chinese, it appears, have a habit of ascribing calamities to the direct judgment of Heaven, to an extent which renders many lives miserable. Mr. W. A. Douthwaite, of Che-foo, says: "A man about twenty-five years old, a native of a town forty miles from Chee-foo, was brought to the hospital suffering from dropsy, and the symptoms were so urgent that we decided to tap him without delay. When we saw him at midnight, ten hours after the operation, he was progressing favorably, but at daylight he foolishly arose from bed, took off the bandages, and walked out into the yard. The consequence was that he died in a few hours. His brother was sent for, and, of course, charged us with having killed him. After the body had been taken home, we learned the following particulars concerning this unhappy youth. A week or too previous to our making his acquaintance he had quarrelled with his mother, and had spoken insultingly to her. Shortly after this dropsy set in. This, his friends assured him, was a judgment of heaven upon him for his unfilial conduct. His mother was taken ill at the same time, and he was charged with being the cause of her sickness. She, however, recovered, while he became worse, and, as a dernier ressort, he was carried to the hospital at Chee-foo.

When it became known at home that he was dead, his relatives turned on his mother, and accused her of having caused his death by provoking him to anger. The poor woman was so utterly bowed down with grief, and so cruelly persecuted and taunted by her neighbors, that when the body of her son was taken home, she returned to her room and committed suicide. Then, of course, the relatives accused each other of having caused her death. Cases of this kind are of frequent occurrence in China; and very often after two people have quarrelled, one of them will deliberately commit suicide, knowing that the other will be punished for manslaughter, and his family probably ruined."

APPROACHING RENEWAL OF JEWISH SACRIFICES AT JERUSALEM.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

It is generally admitted by numerous expositors of Daniel, Ezekiel, Isaiah, Zechariah, and Revelation, that the Restoration of the Jews to Palestine in the latter days will be, first a partial Restoration of some of them from political motives, and, while still rejecting Christianity, a few years before the Advent of Christ; and, secondly, a full Restoration of all of them at and after the Advent of Christ at Jerusalem, when the Millennium commences, and when a New Temple will be built, according to the last eight chapters of Ezekiel. But at their partial earlier restoration they will erect a different temple of their own design, and offer self-righteous sacrifices in it; and Antichrist, in the midst of the final seven years, will sit in that earlier Temple as the Man of Sin.

The Rev. J. G. Gregory, says in his "Earth Eventide" in chapter 3: "When Israel are restored (partially and in unbelief) to their own land, we cannot doubt but that will be to build their House for worship. Their re-occupation of their own land would be as nothing if their Temple, their ritual, and their sacrifices were not present. In fulfilment of the Seventieth Week in Daniel 9:27, 'The Prince shall come,' 'shall confirm a covenant with many for one week, that is, for seven years: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, until the consummation.' He will be of the Jews and the Antichrist. But after the covenant is made—many Jews resettled in their land under his protection—their Temple and sacrificial rites restored, then presently the covenant is broken, and the sacrifice and oblation caused to cease in the midst of the seven years —three years and a half (a "time, times, and a half a time, as predicted in Daniel 7:25; 12:7) will remain for the full display of all the horrors of Antichrist's dominion. Then the Lord shall come and all His saints attending Him, and this Man of Sin shall be consumed.

Numerous other expositors might be quoted who agree that the Jews will re-establish their sacrifices in a rebuilt temple. Among these expositors, Maramensis showed in the Investigator, volume 3, page 293, in A. D. 1834, that this renewal of the sacrifices will be 2,345 literal days before the End of this Age. And as it has recently been discovered that the last day of Passover Week, Thursday, April 11, 1901, will be the End of this Age, therefore Thursday, November 8, 1894, being 2,345 days before April 11, 1901, may be expected to be of the Jewish sacrifices in a rebuilt temple at Jerusalem. Maramensis said: "Now it is evident that the Jews shall, of themselves, return unto their own land and re-establish their own religious worship." With regard to the 2,300 days in Dan. 8:13, 14, the question is asked, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" The answer is: "Unto 2,300 days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." The meaning of the question, expressed in other words, seems to be this: How long shall be the period comprising these events? viz., the establishment of the daily sacrifice, the declension of the Jews into apostacy, the consequent desolation of the holy places, and the treading under foot of their sanctuary. The 2,300 days will, therefore, commence with the first administration of the daily sacrifice, and end with the cleansing of the sanctuary.

"The 1,290 days (as well as the 1,260 days—Dan. 12:7, 11) both commence with the setting up of the abomination of desolation. It seems natural to suppose that there must be some relation between the event that marks the close, and that which marks the commencement of any prophetic period. As, therefore, the 1,290 days begin with the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the abomination of desolation, they will probably end with the cleansing of the sanctuary from that abomination of desolation, and the re-establishment of the Jewish worship. If so, the 2,300 and 1,290 days have a common termination.

"The last period mentioned is the 1,335 days, which begins simultaneously with the 1,260 and 1,290 days, at the commencement of the unparalleled great tribulation, and of Antichrist's three and a half years of persecuting power, and concludes with a period of blessedness. 'Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1,335 days.'" (Dan: 12:12.) (Thus Maramensis held that a total period of 2,345 days will elapse from the renewal of the sacrifices, until the full blessedness at the end of the 1,335 days).

THE LORD'S SECOND COMING.

By the Late Rev. Henry Alford, D. D.

It seems very difficult to conceive that the usual course of this world should ever be broken in upon by such an event as the Second Coming of our Lord. It forms one of the most startling contrasts possible to place side by side with the common every-day thoughts of all of us about things around us.

"Yet a little while, and He that shall come will come." This is our belief. But where in our own days, where in days future, can we assign a time when we can realize

The Fact of His Coming?

Shall it be while earth is at peace, amidst the steady labors of the arts, and while man's thoughts are even and undistracted? Shall the merchant on the exchange, the student at his desk, the traveller on his journey, the mother in her family duties, the children in their school or at their play, be startled with the cry of His approach? So seem some places in Holy Scripture to teach us; and yet how difficult to imagine it! What do any of us expect less, than such a surprise in such employments? What seems more unlike God's ways of dealing with man during all these centuries, than that such a sudden crash should break in upon this settled order of things which He has so far established that it is our duty to Him to see it maintained, and to keep its place among ourselves!

Well, but let us then take the other alternative. Shall that day come upon us amidst fierce wars and distresses, when men's passions are let loose, and their thoughts have lost balance? Shall the ears of the wild combatants in the battle-field be pierced by the shout of the archangel rising over the din of their conflict? Shall the lurid glare of burning homes usher in the revelation of the Son of Man with flames of fire? Shall anguish and mourning be already upon mankind before at which all the tribes of the earth shall mourn? This, again, seems not inconsistent with the testimony of Scripture in other places. But in that case how difficult to imagine God's faithful people waiting and praying; how must their thoughts be distracted, and their Saviour put out of their sight, by the dire necessities of the time! If the Christian prays against sudden death, if he dreads the passing from perhaps a light jest, or a trifling thought, or a festal moment to the presence of his God, how can we avoid the thought that the Church will then be taken at a disadvantage, when fierce passions are raging even in the bosoms whose law is forgiveness, and the ordinary means of grace are suspended? Again, if we put the alternative as to different times of our ordinary life, we shall find it equally difficult to give reality to our expectations of the Lord's Coming.

Now we know that "that day will come and to some it must, like the thief, come in the night itself. But it is impossible to apply this to all mankind, seeing that night and day share our globe alike; and such a consideration entirely prevents any general application of such a description, or of any description, of men's occupations except on the largest scale, when it shall overtake them. They shall be "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, buying and selling, planting and building"; these shall be their general employments over the whole earth: on such things shall their thoughts be; but to give any detailed description of the circumstance as applicable to all men is, from the above reason, impossible.

In our daily work it is that we must prepare for Christ's coming: in the occupations of this day, for the account of that day; by living more purely, more truthfully, more charitably; living more in prayer, more in consciousness of God's presence, more in the cleansing power of the Lord's blessed atonement, and by the guidance of His indwelling Spirit.

One thought may perhaps have been in some minds, as they have been reading these lines, and it is this: "Will not the Lord's coming, to most of us, in all probability be the day of our own death? And would it not be more profitable to be preparing us for that, than to warn us of an event which may not come on the earth in our time?" To this question there are answers which ought to be ever impressed on a Christian's mind. First, the view of things proposed by the inquirer is not that taken in Holy Scripture, which is the rule and pattern of our teaching. There we do not hear anything of preparation for death. I doubt whether one text can be found in which we are exhorted to make such preparation as such. But the constant note, the continually recurring exhortation, is to be prepared for the Lord's coming.

Our second answer goes to the reason of the thing, and in fact gives the account and lays open the foundation of the former, namely, He who is prepared for the Lord's coming is necessarily also prepared for his own death. The greater includes the less. He who so lives, so thinks, so speaks, so works, in his daily life, as to be ready for the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God, will not be found unready when the summons is heard in a more familiar tone in Death, and comes with more previous warning. If he can meet the Lord amidst the flaming heavens and the gathering dead, he will not be loath to obey His call, when its dread reality is tempered with all gentle and kindly alleviation—with the gradual approaches of sickness and infirmity, and the tender solaces of loving friends and watchful attendants.

But, on the other hand, he who has forgotten his Lord's coming, and has simply been careful about readiness for his own dismissal, will ever be too liable in the lesser thing to have neglected care for the greater; and he will also be well-nigh certain to have lowered his standard of attainment and narrowed his sympathies unworthily; in taking thought for himself, to have forgotten the great Body of which he is a member; in minding his own safety, to have forgotten his Lord.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CURRENT EVENTS.

In the Observance of this Day as a Day of National Thanksgiving, we not only follow the hallowed customs of our forefathers, but publicly acknowledge the fact that all our mercies, national and individual, are of God. It would be a matter for deep regret if the significance of the observance were ever to be overlooked and the day to degenerate into a mere public holiday. It therefore behooves all Christians to set the example of a religious observance of the day, and to apply it to the purpose for which it is set apart. While in the majority of homes the day will be one of gladness and festivity, the Christian's home will not be made gloomy, but will rather be sanctified and elevated in its joy by the devout recollection that it is from a loving Father that every good and perfect gift has descended. In some homes the day finds the inmates in sadness and grief, but even there the thought of God's love may call forth chastened gratitude for the hope He gives us of a land in which all tears are wiped away. Nor should it be forgotten that one of the best and most practical methods of observing the day is to find out some family on which poverty is pressing, and see to it that the table is well furnished, for this day at least. He who does so will find that his own enjoyment is enhanced by having promoted the enjoyment of others.

An Escape From a Serious National Dispute should be thankfully acknowledged in the present situation of the Presidential vote in West Virginia. The State was at first claimed by the Democrats, then it was positively declared to be Republican, now it is again claimed by the Democrats. Evidently the plurality, to whomsoever it may belong, is small and doubtful. Had the State of New York gone Democratic, the vote of West Virginia would have decided the election. In that case, with so much doubt attached to it, the exciting struggle of 1876 might have, and probably would have, been renewed, with all the lasting acrimony which marked that struggle. Patriots, therefore, who love their country more than party may rejoice on that ground alone that New York went Republican this year.

An Important Rearrangement of Military commands was announced last week. General O. O. Howard, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on May 31, 1888, has been transferred from the command of the Division of the Pacific to that of the Division of the Atlantic, and General N. A. Miles from Los Angeles to San Francisco, to the command thus vacated by General Howard. The object of the change is to put an end to the double duty hitherto imposed on General Schofield. General Schofield, since the death of General Sheridan, has exercised the command both of the Army and of the Division of the Atlantic, but this was necessarily a temporary arrangement. The officer commanding the army has enough in that relation to occupy his attention, without also carrying the burdens of a division command. The Department of Arizona, in whose administration General Miles has achieved so much credit, and which now passes to a distinguished and veteran officer, Colonel Grierson, is a part of the Division of the Pacific, to the command of which General Miles succeeds.

The Prohibition Vote in the Recent Election appears to have been over-estimated in the statement made here two weeks ago, and then given only as probable. The total vote is now placed, largely on official figures, at 268,505. Gains are recorded in every State but Louisiana, Massachusetts, and Vermont, as compared with the vote of 1884. In each of those States there was a slight loss. In New York State the vote was 30,524, while in 1884 it was 24,999, showing a net Prohibitionist gain of 5,525. The Prohibitionist National Committee, though doubtless disappointed with these figures, yet find in them ground for encouragement. In an address just issued they say, after pointing out the exceptional character of the contest in 1884, when considerable Mugwump support went to the Prohibition ticket: "Eliminating from our St. John vote all who voted the ticket merely as a protest, quite likely the total number would show not more than 100,000 as compared with nearly three times that number who cast their ballots for General Fisk."

The Annual Report of the Treasurer of the United States was issued on Thursday last. It summarizes and condenses the monthly reports of the past year. From this document it appears that during the fiscal year the surplus available for the reduction of the public debt was, in round numbers, $111,000,000—an increase of about $8,000,000 over the previous year. During the year the net Treasury balance increased about $60,000,000, due to an increase of $37,000,000 in the assets, and a diminution of $23,000,000 in the liabilities. The net decrease of the principal of the interest-bearing debt during the year was $75,000,000. Of this amount $51,464,000 in bonds were purchased for the sinking fund; and for the privilege of paying this debt before it was due, the tax-payers gave $8,274,000, a part of which they regain in the cessation of interest. The silver coinage during the year yielded $32,484,000, the bulk of which went into the Treasury vault.

The President-Elect Has Already Had Cause, it appears, to complain of the inundation of applications for appointments. General Harrison, however, is in some measure relieved of a part of the difficulty by the fact that he has not so many offices at his disposal as had his predecessors. During the past few years the scope of the civil-service law has been steadily widened and extended, until now in each of the seven big executive departments, the Agricultural Department, and all their branches, the great mass of the clerical force above the grades of scrub-women, watchmen, and laborers has been brought within the classified service. The Government Printing-Office is the only establishment still outside of the civil-service rules, and remains so because no practical way of applying the merit system to a thousand or more printers has yet been devised. The practice of transferring clerks, who entered the service under non-competitive rules to offices to which the competitive system now applies, has also been partially checked by the new rule requiring every clerk to serve a year before promotion.

A Statesmanlike and Dignified View of the miserable Sackville incident was taken by Lord Randolph Churchill in a speech delivered in England on November 17. He said there was no doubt that Lord Sackville had been primarily indiscreet, and had made an inexcusable blunder. No fault could be found with the action of the United States Government toward the Minister. The American people were essentially just and proud in their relations with other countries. He deprecated the insulting and menacing articles which had appeared in the English press since Lord Sackville's dismissal. He regarded the attitude taken by Mr. Cleveland after the rejection of the Fisheries treaty by the Senate as an unfortunate one. Mr. Cleveland's action had been rather sharp, but it did not justify the menaces, sneers, and sulks in which the newspapers of England had indulged. A war between England and America, he declared, would be more atrocious and dangerous than any war since God created the earth. He trusted that the Government's policy toward the new Washington administration would be conceived with a view to making the American people England's best allies on all questions, and to producing a durable friendship between the English-speaking races, thus guaranteeing to humanity in turn the blessings of liberty and peace. It may be hoped that Lord Churchill's remarks may exercise a wholesome influence on the newspapers of his party, which seem to have lost their heads over the incident.

The German Reichstag Assembled on November 22, and the session was opened by the Emperor in person. His address on the occasion was marked by the egotism and arrogance which characterizes all his utterances; but was ostensibly of a peaceful tenor. He said that he had undertaken to execute his grandfather's precious legacy with reference to social and political legislation; thus studiously ignoring, according to his unfilial custom, the more enlightened example of his father. He went on to say: "Our relations with all foreign Powers are peaceful. My efforts have been unceasing to strengthen this peace. The alliance with Austria and Italy has no other object. To bring without necessity the miseries even of a victorious war upon Germany, would be incompatible with my Christian faith, and my duties toward the German people. The confidence extended to me and my policy at all courts which I have visited, justifies the hope that I, and my allies and friends, with God's help, will be able to preserve the peace of Europe."

The Grave Indiscretion of a Prominent Irish journalist has involved him in a heavy fine, which has been imposed by the judges composing the Parnell commission. Mr Edward Harrington, the proprietor of the Kerry Sentinel, said in that journal that "the judges were showing signs of measles now, although at the opening of the inquiry they had appeared to be spotless. The judges were creatures of the conspiracy entered into by the Government and the Times, and were manifestly unable to veil their prejudices." An opportunity was afforded to the offending journalist to apologize, but he nonchalantly replied that he had no statement to make, except that he would accept responsibility for what appeared in his paper. The judges thereupon fined him $2,500.

A Vigorous Attack on the Irish Policy of the British Government was made last week by Mr. Gladstone. The Conservatives proposed to extend the law known as "the Ashbourne Act," which is a law passed in 1885, appropriating $25,000,000 to assist tenants in purchasing the farms they rent. The Government asked the House to make another appropriation of the same amount. Mr. Gladstone, in opposing the grant, moved that in lieu of voting £5,000,000, it is expedient, in view of the lamentable sufferings arising from recent evictions in Ireland, to extend the Land law of 1887 so as to empower the courts to reduce or cancel arrears of rents that are found to be excessive. He said that if the Government had the tenants' welfare earnestly at heart, if they meant to relieve distressed tenants, they would deal with arrears instead of pressing a dangerous measure which provided machinery for preventing a reduction of rent, and which afforded facilities for augmenting rents and multiplying evictions, with all their horrible incidents. The House, however, rejected Mr. Gladstone's amendment by a majority of eighty-four.

Clergymen Desiring to Increase their Income, or to raise money for church purposes, are reminded that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pays a liberal commission to any person canvassing for subscribers. In several instances recently, quite considerable sums have been realized with ease in this way. Large numbers of Christian persons, whom it is impossible for the publishers to reach, would be pleased to subscribe, if a copy the paper was placed in their hands. The introduction is therefore mutually beneficial. One inadequately paid clergyman has written us that the amount he received in commissions for the year, equalled the amount which he received from his church as salary.

The Blessing that May Follow a Simple Invitation is forcibly illustrated in a statement recently made by the Secretary of the Milwaukee, Wis., Y. M. C. A. He said: "On a recent Saturday evening, a stranger arose at our meeting and said that he had been a dissipated man, and for several days past had been spending much of his time in a gambling saloon; that passing along the street an invitation was handed him, and he found it was a meeting in the Young Men's Christian Association. One of our young men talked with him, and he said he would be at church in the morning. He was there, and said he would be at our afternoon meeting. During that meeting he gave more fully his experience, and said: 'I am going home to Chicago in the morning, and by God's help I will lead a Christian life.' A letter was written that day to the Chicago Secretary, and he was followed up, and two weeks later word came 'that man is all right, and is to be received into —— church, at the next communion.'"

A Wandering Heir is Being Sought by a Firm of New York lawyers. About fifteen years ago a young man named Andrew J. Baker left his home in Tacoma, Washington Territory, to travel. His father was not then in prosperous circumstances, and the young man, besides hoping to make his fortune, was anxious to rid himself of parental control. He has not been heard of by his family since 1881, when he was in Detroit, Mich., in abject poverty. Since his departure, his father made several successful speculations, by which he realized an enormous fortune. He died recently, leaving a will by which his absent son is heir to a large part of his estate. But the young man cannot be found. Advertisements have been inserted in city and country journals, inquiring for him, but without success. It is thought that he must have obtained employment in some obscure place in which New York journals are not taken, or be too poor to get a sight of them. If that is so, the condition of the young man strikingly resembles that of some Christians who, though heirs of God through Christ fail to use the privileges at their disposal, and live in spiritual poverty, neglecting to claim the riches of grace which God is ready to give them. (Rom. 8:32.)

A Judge's Decision in New York Caused poignant distress to a lady and child on November 20. The case before him was an appeal from a mother for the custody of her child. She said that some years ago she was left a widow, with nine children. She was unable to support them, and looked around for kind and well-to-do persons who would relieve her of some of them. She heard of a lady who was willing to adopt a little girl, and the widow agreed to let her have her little daughter Carrie, then six years old. Lately the widow married again, and, her second husband being in prosperous circumstances, she desired to recover her children. The lady who had Carrie, however, declined to part with the child, and the mother thereupon appealed to the court. Both the child and the lady who had adopted her pleaded with the judge against the mother. The child especially begged, with tears, that she might not be given to her mother. The judge, however, had no option in the case. As the mother would not waive her claim, he had to make an order for the restoration of the child. There was a pathetic scene in court when his decision was announced: the lady fainted, and little Carrie hung over her, weeping and kissing the unconscious face, and with her arms about the neck of her adopted mother, piteously entreated that they might not be separated. Finally she had to be removed by force. Happily for those who have become the children of God and received the spirit of adoption, there is no power that can separate them and carry them back to their old life in the world, when they were the children of the wicked one. (Rom. 8:15, 35.)

Noble Blood was Introduced into a Sufferer's veins in Georgia recently. About two weeks ago a woman residing at Tallulah Falls, Ga., met with a severe accident, in which she lost a large quantity of blood. A physician was sent for, but before he could arrive the vital stream continued to flow in spite of the efforts of the bystanders to check it. After the physician came, and the hemorrhage was stopped, the patient was in danger of death from exhaustion. She sank continuously, until the physician declared that only transfusion of blood from a healthy person could save her. When this was known, a young French noble, Count Percy N. de Duboyeay, who is staying at Tallulah Falls, offered himself for the purpose. A blood-vessel was opened in his arm, and the life-giving fluid passed through a tube into a corresponding vessel in the arm of the dying woman. The result was astonishing; the patient revived, and the physician predicts that she will recover. If she does, she will owe her life to the nobleman who gave his blood to save her. Though the distinction between noble and plebeian blood is not recognized here as it is in Europe, we can fully appreciate the real nobility of the man who would make the sacrifice for a comparative stranger. It would be well if all who admire it were moved by that far greater sacrifice that the Son of God made when He shed His blood to save sinful men. (Col. 1:20–22.)

A Precaution Caused Disaster in New York on November 21. An automatic fire-alarm signal summoned the firemen, late at night, to a large building on Broadway. The place was let out to several-dry goods firms, each firm occupying an entire floor. When the engines arrived an attempt was made to fight the fire from the stairs, but it was found to be impossible to reach it in that way, as there were long passages between the staircases which used up the hose before getting at the seat of the fire. It was then decided to flood the building from the roof, but, on climbing up by the building next door, the firemen found that the roof of the burning building could not be easily broken up. It seems that the builder had been fearful of its being fired by sparks which might fall upon it if neighboring buildings should be burned. He had therefore taken the precaution of making his roof of solid brick. The firemen spent much valuable time in trying to pry up the bricks, but without avail. The builder had fixed them too securely. Finally they had to go into the next building and break a hole through the party-wall to admit the hose. While these efforts were being made, the fire raged unchecked, and the loss proved five times as great as it would have been if the roof had been an ordinary one. It is so in spiritual matters. In that great fire which the apostle tells us will try all human work, it will be found that those who have trusted in their own devices will suffer loss. (1 Cor. 3:13, 19.)

A Fatal Wedding Trip was Taken by a young couple in West Virginia last week. On November 20 there was a wedding at St. George, in Tucker County. After the ceremony, the young couple started for a trip in the picturesque region known as the Land of Canaan. They reached Carrack's Ford that night, and the following day set out for the great Falls of the Black Water, crossing by the unfinished bridge of the West Virginia Central Railroad. The only footwalk was a single narrow plank, and when about half-way over, the bride, who had just turned to wave a good-bye to friends on the bank, grew dizzy, lost her balance, and fell from the bridge, with a shriek. Almost before she struck the water her husband sprang after her, and in an instant both had been whirled away in the foaming torrent. Black Water is unusually high, and the current runs at more than fifteen miles an hour, the water being very rough. Several persons saw the accident, and two men launched a boat, which was drawn by ropes into the middle of the stream nearly a quarter of a mile below the bridge. As the husband and wife, clasped in each other's arms, drifted down, they were seized and lifted into the boat. But the husband was dead, and the wife, though restored to life, is likely to lose her reason. When she waved her good-bye to her friends behind her, she doubtless forgot how precarious was her foothold on the narrow pathway. It is so with some who are setting out in the Christian life. The danger of looking back, and the necessity of keeping the eyes fixed on Jesus, are impressed on the young convert by Christ and His apostles. (Luke 9:61, 62.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Charles C. Grafton, of Boston, has been elected Bishop of Fond du Lac, Wis.

Mr. Henry Varley and family have arrived safely in Australia. Mr. Varley expects to remain in that country for a few years.

The women of the entire Presbyterian Church North contributed last year for foreign missions, $295,501.03, and to home missions, $226,067.24.

George S. Avery has been secured to conduct special evangelistic meetings among the Massachusetts Young Men's Christian Associations by their State Committee.

The work of the Rev. B. Fay Mills in Philadelphia was largely blessed among young people. Special services were held for them, and the results have been encouraging.

Evangelist Vine has commenced at Jamaica, L. I., a series of meetings, to be held during the winter on Long Island, under the auspices of the L. I. Baptist Association.

At a service recently held for old people by the Rev. Samuel Scoville, at Stamford, Conn., many venerable persons attended. Three of them were over ninety years of age, and six of them over eighty.

There are now in the mission-field 2,400 unmarried ladies, besides probably an equal number of married. In the early days of missions it was not thought a lady could enter the ranks, except as the wife of a missionary.

Evangelist Grace Weiser's meetings at Monson, Mass., were largely attended, and many persons made profession of faith. Among them were several young men of remarkable natural ability. From Monson, Miss Weiser went to Philadelphia.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's work at Davenport, Iowa, is described in the Morning Democrat, of that city. It adds: "Never in the history of the city has there been so great a religious awakening as has attended the coming of Dr. Munhall and Professor Towner and wife."

The American Christian Missionary Society, which is auxiliary to the General Board of Missions of the Episcopal Church, held its twenty-ninth annual session in Washington recently. About 250 delegates were present, including many of the bishops of the Church.

In Bartow County, Ga., the results of the Prohibition law are being felt. The last grand jury failed to furnish a single indictment for crime, and the county jail has been without an inmate for months, a condition of things in strong contrast with that preceding the prohibitory amendment. The population of the county is 20,000.

At a meeting lately held in England in connection with the Central African Mission, the collection included a valuable gold ring, and a small parcel was handed to the chairman, which was found to contain a Roman pearl ring, a Roman antique ring, a diamond ring, four ladies' shawl-pins, and other articles, all for the Mission.

A Temperance missionary is employed in Toronto, and during the month of October he visited over two hundred families. Encouraging results have followed the missionary's labors among prisoners. One man who was reclaimed from drunkenness some time ago, has given proof of his reformation by sending a check for $200 to the funds of the mission.

The Executive Committee of the Ramabai Association wish to correct a statement that has lately been made in some papers to the effect that Ramabai had already raised the full sum desired for her school. In all, about $20,000 has been contributed in this country for the Ramabai school-fund, and about $12,000 more will be needed for the erection of a building, on the supposition that the land may be given by friends in India.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back number if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

JESUS SET AT NOUGHT.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Herod, with his men of war, set him at nought." Luke 23 : 11.

A Shameless Business—I. Who is the Most Likely Person to Set Jesus at Nought—Herod at one Time a Glad Hearer of the Word—Had Done Violence to his Conscience—Had Yielded to Bad Companions — II. Herod's Reasons — Christ's Gentleness—His Refusal to Gratify Curiosity—His Royal Claims — III. How Jesus is Set at Nought Now — By Refusal to Consider His Claims—By Attention to Business and Amusements—By Despising the Gospel—His Speedy Coming—IV. What Believers Say of Their Lord.

IT is your Lord whom Herod set at nought! Once worshipped of angels and all the heavenly host, He is made nothing of by a ribald regiment. In Himself "the brightness of His Father's glory, and the express image of His person"; but now set at nought by men not worthy of the name. Soon to reassume all His former glory with the Father, and to descend in infinite splendor to judge the earth in righteousness, and reign as King of kings; and yet here He is set at nought! It is a sight of horror and of shame. How could angels bear to see it? This paltry prince and his rough retinue made nothing of Him who is All in all; they treated Him as beneath their contempt. The veriest abjects flouted Him. The meanest soldier in the petty army of a petty princelet made unholy mirth of heaven's high Lord and earth's Redeemer. What a sorrowful and shameless business! May we be helped to sorrow over it!

Herod himself set Him at nought. In this loathsome being I see the most likely person to think nothing of the Lord Jesus. Let me just say a word or two about this member of a detestable family, that I may see whether his like can be found here to-night. I will not give you any history of this Herod. It is not worth while. This "fox" is not worth unearthing. The page of history is stained by the Herodian name. I will give you enough concerning him to help you to answer the question—Are you like him? Have you set Christ at nought?

The Persons Who Do It.

I. This shall be our first inquiry: Who is the most likely person to set our Lord at nought? Herod was a man who had once heard the word of God; yes, he heard it with a measure of attention and apparent benefit. We read: "Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and an holy, and observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly." According to the margin, Herod "kept him or saved him"—preserving him from those who would have laid violent hands upon him. But he broke away from his respectful regard of John, and now that Jesus stands before him, his memory of the Baptist does not restrain him from mocking the Baptist's Lord. We often find that the greatest despisers of Christ are those who formerly were hearers and readers of His Word, but have turned from it. Am I talking to any here who, not so many years ago, were regular attendants upon a faithful ministry, but who have grown weary of it, and given it up? It troubles your conscience that you have done so, and now you try to conceal your uneasiness by picking holes in your former minister, and finding fault with the truths which he preached to you. Herod heard John, but he ridiculed Jesus. See to what unconverted hearers may come!

If I look at Herod again, I see in him a man who, after hearing the Word faithfully preached, had distinctly Done Violence to his Conscience.

He heard John until John came home to him about the woman with whom he was living in an incestuous union. Herodias would have killed John at once; and though Herod did not dare to go so far as that, yet he shut him up in prison. A filthy lust must not be rebuked; Herod imprisons his reprover. The man who could do this was in training for the more daring act of setting the Lord Jesus at nought. First despise the man, and then the Master.

My friend, do you remember that night when you distinctly decided for the devil? Do you recollect when, after having the evil set before you, and seeing it, and counting the cost, you decided to continue in it? Then you turned with bitterness upon the honest reprover whose rebuke you had aforetime endured. Perhaps it was your wife upon whom you turned with anger. What hard words you said to her for the gentle remark she ventured to make! It was an effort for you. You gave conscience an awful wrench; and therefore you put youself into a passion, and talked like an injured man. Or was it your brother? It may be you quitted his society in order to be free from his remarks. Was it your child, or your friend? You could not put them in prison; but you were determined that you would not bear any more of their protests. By all this you have prepared yourself to set the Lord at nought; and we cannot wonder that you do so.

This man also had yielded to sinful companions, and had committed a gross sin as the result of it, for when Herodias danced, and he promised to give her whatsoever she desired, she asked the head of John the Baptist in a charger; and he, not liking to break his word in the presence of the guests, and not willing to stand out against the woman with whom he yielded, and the Baptist's head was taken from his shoulders. Ah, well! you may not have sinned quite in that way; but you, too, once had better thoughts and higher aims. Your companions were too many for you, and drove all good out of you. If there had been a spark of true manhood in you, you would have resisted the suggestion of those enemies in the garb of friends. This is the man that thinks nothing of Christ—the man who thinks so much of drinking and dancing, and of the companions which such things have brought around him. Of course, he does not think anything of Christ, for His ways would take from him these vile associates. Jesus cannot be valued by a man of Herod's sort, who puts so high a value upon the opinion of those who sit at his banquets.

Once more: the man who thinks nothing of Christ is the man that even as Herod did. The die was cast; his mind was made up for evil. He would be very glad to hear Christ: he has no objection still to go to a place of worship and listen to a preacher. He would be very pleased to see a miracle; he would join in a revival, for he would be glad to enjoy something sensational, but he does not mean to give up the sin in which he lives, nor the company which eggs him on in it. He does not mean to cut off the right hand, and pluck out the right eye. Not he! "It is not at all surprising that such a man should speak evil of Christ. It is as natural to such a man to talk against Christ as for a dog to bark." When a bad fellow once praised Socrates, that philosopher said, "I wonder what I can have been doing amiss, that such a man should speak well of me!" If lustful lips praised the Saviour, one might begin to be afraid; but when they denounce and deride Him, we feel that it is the only homage which vice can pay to purity.

This, then, is the man who sets Jesus at nought. I wonder whether he is here now! Possibly it is a woman who is doing this. Women fall into precisely the same evils as men from their own side of the house, and the same remarks apply to both sexes. You who once were hearers, you who once were impressed, you who did wilful violence to conscience, you who persist in sin, you who are the slaves of evil company, and dare not do right for the life of you, for fear of ridicule—you are the kind of people of whom Herod was a sad specimen: you set Jesus at nought.

His Reason for His Act.

II. Having tried to find out Herod, let us now answer a second question—On what ground did he set our Lord at nought? Herod sets Him up as the butt of his ridicule, and makes nothing of Him. I suppose that part of the reason why he and his men of war made nothing of our Lord was because of His gentleness and patience. Our Lord had no sword, and none of the temper of men who wear weapons. His visage was not like the face of a man of war: it was marred with grief, but not with anger; worn with sorrow, but not with battle. If He had any weapons they were His tears and His almighty love; but these the Herodian ruffians utterly despised. All unarmed He stood before them, and when He was reviled He reviled not again. The Christian religion teaches us to be meek and gentle, to forgive injuries, and even to give up our own rights rather than to inflict wrong. Such precepts savor of cowardice to the blustering world. Non-resistance they cannot hear of. The sweet savor of which the spirit of Jesus breathes into the hearts of His people, is by many held in contempt. They call it cant and hypocrisy, because it is so inconsistent with their ideas of manly conduct.

Furthermore, our Lord was ridiculed by Herod because He refused to gratify his curiosity and amuse his love of sensation. The wicked Herod virtually said to the holy Jesus: "Come, work us a miracle. We hear that thou didst deliver from death: now release Thyself from our hands. Thou canst do all things, so report says of thee—come, do some little thing, that we may see and believe. Work a miracle before us." There stands our Lord, with all power in His hands, but He will not lift a finger for His own deliverance and Herod's amusement. Oh, blessed Jesus! it is the same still—thou wilt not amuse, and therefore men prefer any charlatan to thee.

The Royal Claims of Jesus excited their scorn. I think I hear the "Aha! aha! aha!" of Herod as he said: "Call Him a King? You could find such kings as this in every street in Jerusalem. Talk of a kingdom for Him! Go to the pool of Bethesda, and fetch up some poor wretch who lies waiting there for the moving of the water, and call him a king! King! What hosts are at Thy command? What kingdom dost Thou govern? What laws canst Thou make? Here! put the white robe upon Him. Let Him at least look like a monarch. Yes, that old robe will do! Is He not every inch a King?" Then the soldiery took up the jest! How bitterly, how derisively, did they make His Royalty the football of contempt! Thus to-day the world makes nothing of the royalty of King Jesus. A nominal King He may be, but as a real King they will not have Him. Those who would be in the dust before the meanest princelet have no esteem for Him.

Those, I suppose, were the grounds upon which Herod, and such as Herod, make light of Christ. Poor grounds they are, and such as will fail to justify them before the bar of God.

How He is Set at Nought.

III. Now, dear friends, let us consider. How do men now set our Lord at nought? Herod is dead and buried, and there is no sort of reason why we should not let him rot into oblivion. I therefore speak to you, and try to discover whether you are setting Christ at nought. I fear there are such. Who are they?

Some set him at nought, for they will not even consider His claims. "Oh," say they, "we have plenty else to think about besides religion! What is there in it which will fill our pockets? There is nothing at all in it worth a moment's attention." How do they know? They do not know. Nothing in it? God gives His own Son to die for guilty men, and there is nothing in it! The highest thoughts of God are set forth in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you do not think it worth while even to consider what God has therein revealed? Who is to save the man who will not listen when salvation is put before him? Yet the great mass of our fellow citizens are of this kind. In London there are millions who make so little of Christ that they will not even come to hear what His ministers have to say about Him, nor read their Bibles, nor show the least interest in the matter. It many a house in London, Mahomet is practically as much esteemed as Jesus. Ah me!

There are many others who prefer their business to Jesus. They would not mind giving some little attention to the Lord Jesus, but then they are too busy just now. They say that they really cannot afford the time. Oh my busy hearer! you will have to find time to die before long: why not think of that solemn certainty? You are very busy, and yet you find time to eat. Have you no time to feed your soul? You find time to put on your dress; have you no time to dress your souls? You seek out the surgeon when you are ill; have you no time to seek out a Saviour for your soul? Ah! it is not that: you have the time, but you have not the heart.

Others Prefer Amusements to the Lord Jesus. "Well," says one, "we must have recreation. In my spare time I like a game." I know that. I am not for denying you healthy recreation, but everything should be in order, and I claim first place for Jesus Christ and His salvation. What! is it not worth while to give up a sport to seek Jesus? Do you think a game of cards more important than seeking the pardon of your sin? An evening at the theatre or the music-hall; do you really think so little of Jesus that you can live without Him, and satisfy your mind with these poor things? Can you suffer the paltry amusements of the world to stand before the Lord Jesus? Yet it is so with some of you.

You Will Know Better One Day.

Another sort of persons make nothing of Christ, because they profess to see nothing profound and philosophical in the faith which he has revealed. These are the Greeks, to whom the doctrine of the Cross is foolishness. Oh foolish Greeks! These wise men will not hear some of us because we can be understood of the people. "Anybody can understand you," say they; "you speak after the manner of the crowd, and what you say is simple enough to be clear to the most ignorant. We like something deeper, something too profound to be readily grasped. We are above commonplace people, and need something more intellectual and philosophical." A man of note once said to me, "Why do you keep on preaching to those thousands at Newington? Preach so that the mob will leave you, and the élite will support you." To whom I answered, that if one man's soul was of less value than another, his was of the least value who could talk so slightingly of others.

Others make nothing of the Lord because they confide in themselves. They think themselves quite good enough without a Saviour. If they are not quite perfect, they believe that they can make themselves so, and be saved without an atoning sacrifice, or a new heart, or union to Christ. They are doing their best, and they make no doubt whatever that they will find their way to heaven as well as others. Do you thus think? You are in grave error. There was a learned Romanist who once ventured to say that if salvation could only be had on terms of free grace, he would not have it. Do you know what happened? Why, he did not have it: that was all. And that is what will happen to you.

Many have no fears concerning the day of His appearing. Whether you believe it or not, Jesus, as your Judge, is at the door. He said, years ago, "Behold, I am Coming Quickly."

He is still coming, and must soon arrive to commence the last dread session of justice. What matters it how many more years may elapse? They will fly like the wind. The day will come when heaven and earth shall be ablaze. The thick darkness will lower down,

"And, withering from the vault of night,
The stars shall pale their feeble light."

The hour will come when the earth and sky will rock and reel, and pass away, rolled up like a worn-out vesture. Then shall the trumpet ring out exceeding loud and long—"Awake, ye dead, and come to judgment!" How will you endure that voice which shall disturb the stillness of the sepulchre? "Come to judgment! Come to judgment! Come to judgment!" How it will peal forth! None of you will be able to resist the call. From your beds of dust you will start up, amazed, to a terrible awakening. From the sea, from the land, from the teeming cemetery, from the lonely grave, men will rise, and all of them stand before Christ! In that day you will see nothing but the great white throne, and Him that sits upon it. You will be unable to close your eyes, or turn your gaze elsewhere.

IV. But I close with this: What do believers say about their Lord? Herod made nothing of him:

What do we Make of Him?

Well, we say, first, that we mourn and lament that there ever was a time when we ourselves made nothing of the glorious One. It is many years ago with some of us; but we cannot forget it, nor cease to bewail it. There were a certain number of years in our lives in which it was nothing to us that Jesus should die. Oh, my dear hearers, perhaps some of you have been lately converted after forty or fifty or sixty years of sin. Repent with all your hearts that you were Herods so long. Christ has forgiven you; but can you forgive yourselves? No; I think that you still smite on your breast, and say, "Lord, I grieve that ever I lived a moment without acknowledging my Lord—that I ever ate a meal or drew in a breath without bowing before Him." Lord, bury those years in forgetfulness which we spent in forgetfulness of thee!

Next, it is now our grief that any others should set the Lord Jesus at nought. It must be a great grief to any man here if she who lies in his bosom sets the Lord at nought. Dear woman, I know what your daily burden must be if the husband who is so dear to you does not love your Saviour, whom you love with a higher love. What an anguish it is to nourish and bring up children, and see them refuse our Lord! "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth"; and no greater sorrow than to see them running into evil ways. Could we really see the heart of an unregenerate man or woman, it would cause us the utmost distress. It is an awful thing: as awful as hell itself! Out in that street to-night think of the thousands who will be hunting for the precious life. Walk along our crowded thoroughfares, and think of the myriads even of this city who live and die without God, and without hope, making nothing of Jesus, and you will feel a heartbreak which will make life a burden. I could wish that you felt that heartbreak for their sakes, and for Christ's sake.

But then, dear friends, what do we make of Christ ourselves now? Well, that I cannot tell you, except it be in one word Christ is All.

Herod made nothing of Him; we make everything of Him. Could any of you who love my Lord tell me what you think of Him? I am sure that you would break down in the attempt. For my own part, I always fail in the glad endeavor. If we could give every drop of our blood for Jesus, if we could be burnt at a slow fire for a century for Him, He deserves all our suffering and all our life. Could our zeal no respite know, a whole eternity of service would not adequately set forth what we think of Him.

I close with this practical thought: Sometimes believers show their love and their appreciation of their Master by special acts of homage. Herod, you see, when he made nothing of Him, said, "Here, bring out that glittering white robe of mine, and put it on Him, that we may heap contempt upon Him. He calls Himself a King! Let us pay Him homage!" They mocked Him, and they put the robe upon Him, and then sent Him back to Pilate. Now, I want you to imitate Herod in the opposite direction. Let us resolve that for His sake we will speak well of His name to somebody to whom we have not yet spoken. Herod set Him at nought, but let us set Him on high in our best manner. Set Him at the highest figure that your thought and your imagination can reach. Oh, how would I honor Him! But what am I? What can one person do? Therefore do I summon all things that are to praise the Lord, without whom was not anything made. I charge all living things to adore Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. Let space become one great mouth for song. Let time unceasingly flow with hallelujahs. Let eternity become an orchestra to the praise of Jesus, who was mocked of Herod and his men of war. Glory be to His name! Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THERE are few more jarring scenes in English history than the last days of Queen Elizabeth. "As life was passing away," a historian says, "she clung to it with a fierce tenacity. She hunted, she danced, she jested with her young favorites, she coquetted and frolicked and scolded at sixty-seven as she had done at thirty." "The Queen," wrote a courtier, "a few months before her death was never so gallant these many years, nor so set upon jollity." She persisted, in spite of opposition, in her gorgeous progresses from country house to country house. She clung to business as of old, and raged in her usual fashion one "who minded not to give up some matter of account." And then a strange melancholy settled upon her. Her mind gave way, and food and rest became alike distasteful. Clever woman, yet very foolish in not discerning how vain it was to attempt to carry the brisk habits of youth into old age, and most profoundly foolish in not having taken pains to provide for old age the enjoyments appropriate to itself. How differently it has fared with those who have been wise in time and made the best provision for old age! "I have waited for Thy salvation, O my God," says the dying Jacob, relieved and happy to think that the object for which he had waited had come at last. "I am now ready to be offered," says St. Paul, "and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, will give me at that day." Which is the better portion—he whose old age is spent in bitter lamentation over the departed joys and brightness of his youth, or he whose sun goes down with the sweetness and serenity of an autumn sunset, but only to rise in a brighter world, and shine forth in the glory of immortal youth?

The Prince's Fall.

A recent writer, when narrating the fall of Cardinal Wolsey, powerfully describes the way of Providence in suffering a career of unexampled wickedness and ambition to go from one degree of prosperity to another, till the moment of doom arrives, when all is shattered by a single blow. "There was long delay, but the hour of reckoning at length arrived. Slowly the hand had crawled along the dial-plate; slowly, as if the end would never come; and wrong was heaped on wrong, and oppression cried, and it seemed as if no ear had heard its voice, till the measure of the wickedness was at length fulfilled. The finger touched the hour, and as the strokes of the great hammer rang out above the nation, in an instant the whole fabric of iniquity was shivered to ruins." This hour had now come to Absalom. He had often been reproved, but had hardened his heart, and was now to be destroyed, and that without remedy.

A King Under Reproof.

When Nathan ended his message (II Sam. 12: 13-25), plainly and strongly though he had spoken, David indicated no irritation, made no complaint against the prophet, but simply and humbly confessed—"I have sinned." It is so common for men to be offended when a servant of God remonstrates with them, and to impute their interference to an unworthy motive, and to the desire of some one to hurt and humiliate them, that it is refreshing to find a great king receiving the rebuke of the Lord's servant in a spirit of profound humility and frank confession. Very different was the experience of John the Baptist when he remonstrated with Herod. Very different was the experience of the famous Chrysostom when he rebuked the Emperor and Empress for conduct unworthy of Christians. Very different has been the experience of many a faithful minister in a humbler sphere, when, constrained by a sense of duty, he has gone to some man of influence in his flock, and spoken seriously to him of sins which bring a reproach on the name of Christ. Often it has cost the faithful man days and nights of pain. Girding himself for the duty has been like preparing for martyrdom, and it has been really martyrdom when he has had to bear the long, malignant enmity of the man whom he has rebuked. However vile the conduct of David may have been, it is one thing in his favor, that he receives his rebuke with perfect humility and submission. He makes no attempt to palliate his conduct, either before God or man, but sums up the whole feeling in those expressive words: "I have sinned against the Lord."

IT had been a long, tiring day in the Mullins household, for Mrs. Mullins was packing up all her home treasures for removal to the new home in the village three miles away. Not that the whole contents of the house would have brought much under the auctioneer's hammer. Treasures they could not properly be called, in the sense of the market, but they were treasures to her, for the home she was leaving had been her home from her birth, and she was glad that when she married she did not have to leave it. Her aged father and mother had welcomed her lover to their household, and had urged that their only remaining daughter should not leave them, but set up her married home in the extension at the side of the cottage. But she had to leave the dear old place now, for John had had what the neighbors called, "a stroke of luck." The squire in the next village had taken a fancy to him, and offered him the position of head-gardener, with a nice roomy cottage to live in. Mrs Mullins, therefore, packed up cheerfully, though she wished the luck could have come to them in the old place. At last everything was piled in the wagon, which John's new employer had lent them; and Mrs. Mullins, putting on her bonnet, prepared to walk by Silas the wagoner's side to the new home.

"What makes you carry the picter for?" Silas asked, when they had walked beside the loaded wagon a short distance. "Put her in the wagon. There's room; she won't be broken."

"Oh, it isn't heavy," said Mrs. Mullins; "I wouldn't feel it was safe if I didn't carry it myself."

"Something extra pretty, is it?" asked Silas.

"Maybe you won't think so," said Mrs. Mullins, taking the cloth off it and holding it up, "but it means a good deal to John and me."

Silas looked at it and read, "Without shedding of blood, there is no remission of sins." He thought silently for a moment and then said, "No, I don't see much in it, that's a fact."

"I guess not," said Mrs. Mullins. "It's like water, or money, or health: when you know the want of it, you know the worth of it—not before. You see, remission means—"

"Oh, I know that," Silas interrupted; "good cause to know. When the old man died, and mother was awful sick, and all the money was gone, I went to the agent to ask time with the rent. Mother couldn't go, so I went. I told him all about it, and he said he'd see the squire, and I was to come again next week. Well, I went, and what do you think the agent said? He said the squire told him the rent was to be remitted. I didn't know what he meant, and I guess I looked a bit mixed. But the agent, he laughed and he said, 'Where did you go to school, Silas? The squire means you have not got to pay it at all. That's better than you asked for. You wanted time to pay, but he's letting you off free.' I guess I won't need to ask anybody again what remission means. It meant bread and meat to us that time. But I don't see the point of the picter, for all that."

"Don't you? Well, it means about the same. You know what happened at our house after the old folks died. John kept all right while they lived, and so did I. Afterward, you know, he went wrong, and I don't say but what I was to blame too. You heard all about it, I guess. It was talked about pretty well. (Silas nodded.) Well, we made up our minds to turn over a fresh leaf, and we did—pretty nearly. The clergyman talked, and one or another had their say, and altogether we pulled around. But we were troubled about the past. Not so much because of people throwing it up at us, but both of us wanted to get religion, and seemed as if what we'd done shut us out. We asked John's uncle about it one day, when he came in to see how we were doing, and he allowed God wouldn't hold it against us if we did right now. We weren't sure though, and its a bad thing to make mistakes in.

"Well, one day there were some meetings being held by a sort of wandering preacher, and John and I, we went to hear him. He preached about these very words. Said sin couldn't be got rid of by turning over a new leaf. We knew that, because it kept on worrying us. There was only one way ever known, and that was by death; and then he told us how Jesus knew that and He was so anxious about all of us, and so sorry because we had all sinned, and could never be happy after we were dead, that He agreed to die for us. And that was how He came to be crucified, like the clergyman preaches about. And then God remits—wipes out, you know. Well, that was just what we wanted; and we had some talk with the preacher, and got it out quite clear and sure, and, I tell you, it made us right over new, and took all the load off. Soon after that, when John was over in the city, he saw that very text all framed in a window, and he went right in and bought it to hang up in our house, and this is it."

"You ain't had any more worry?" asked Silas.

"No; this holds good always."

"Well I ain't quite clear myself," said Silas.

"Get this, and you will be," said Mrs. Mullins.

MR. DANIEL HAND.

The Millionaire Philanthropist.

THE most extreme Socialist could obtain no hearing for his onslaughts on "bloated bondholders" if many of our millionaires were influenced by the principles of Daniel Hand. It would be difficult to conceive of an act of purer patriotism than that which, as we recently mentioned in our news columns, he has just performed. In placing in the hands of the American Missionary Association a million dollars to be used in educating the colored race, he has conferred a benefit on the whole nation. For the ignorance of any class or section involves danger to all other classes.

Daniel Hand is eighty-seven years old, having been born at Madison, Conn., in 1801. When he was seventeen years of age he went South and assisted his uncle in a grocery business in Augusta, Ga. His uncle eventually made him his heir. He prospered financially, being of an industrious, painstaking disposition. He also took an active part in Christian work, and was for upward of thirty years superintendent of the Sunday-school of the First Presbyterian Church of Augusta. He subsequently opened a store at Charleston, S. C., and that too was a success. His abolition principles rendered it unsafe to remain in the South during the war. He was in prison for two weeks, but was respectfully and kindly treated. When he was released he hand

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

The New Day.

It was well for Madelling that he did lay aside le Havelock's letter for perusal at some more orable time. Though it was not the kind of er he supposed, it was of a nature to stir his sions deeply, and arouse an agitation within prejudicial to his spiritual life.

was a curious fact that the same mail carried tter in the same handwriting to Madeline ters. It reached her at the close of a day orry and distress. In the morning she had ived a call from Mr. Duneman, who, after aining some days in his rooms, in fear of a tition of violence at the hands of Madelling, ength mustered courage to venture out.

glance at the young man showed Madeline he had devoted more care than usual to personal appearance, and his manner was so ressive as to suggest that his visit was hted with an important purpose. What purpose was, Duneman soon revealed. the circumlocution which he would have in opening an address in college, he describis position and prospects, and then formally e her an offer of marriage.

ice or twice Madeline tried to interrupt to spare him, if possible, the pain she knew ould have to suffer. But it was useless.
eman had strong faith in the power of his eloquence. His proposal had been care-prepared to appeal to the strongest points adeline's nature, and he expected much his final words, which, in the character of a ation, depicted in glowing colors the joy happiness she would have as the wife of a ster of the gospel.

ideline saw that the whole story must be so she sat still, with all the patience she l command, until the end was reached, and man, bending on one knee beside her, tried ssess himself of her hand. No good woman isten unmoved to an avowal of sincere love, if she cannot reciprocate it. It is a treas-ot to be purchased by wealth or labor, and she realizes that it is not to be treated lightly or frivolously. Besides this, Madeline's kind heart shrank from inflicting pain on any one, and in this case especially she dreaded making it more acute than was necessary. Duneman's coarser nature misunderstood this delicate consideration, and failed to perceive the hopelessness of his suit. A girl who could speak so gently and tenderly must surely have, he thought, some regard for him. He continued to plead, and at length told her that if she refused him he should be so overwhelmed by the disappointment that he would have no heart to pursue his studies, and should abandon the ministry. On her would rest the responsibility of destroying his career of usefulness.

"Do not threaten me, Mr. Duneman," she said. "I think if you can be turned from such a career by my refusal—if you have no stronger, higher motives for entering upon it than those that any words of mine can influence—it would be well that you should abandon it. If you are called of God to the work, you dare not disobey; if you are not so called, your engaging in it would be a profanation. In either case my answer is the same. I can never marry you, for I do not love you. That is final."

"It is that infidel ruffian Madelling," he said, an angry flush overspreading his features, "who has prejudiced you against me. You will marry him and be miserable."

"I do not wish to hurt your feelings," said Madeline; "when you are more collected, you will see that your words are ungentlemanly. Do not let us import an irrelevant question into an interview which is painful to us both. Accept my answer for yourself, and let that content you. I assure you that under no circumstances could I give you any other. Now you will go, will you not?"

At last even Duneman, obtuse as he was, perceived that he had no hope, and he went from her presence hot and angry, and with an ardent longing for revenge on the man whom he deemed his successful rival.

Madeline was restless and distraught all through the remainder of the day. She spent some time in solitary self analysis. Duneman was wrong about Madelling. If she had never known Hadley, she would have given Duneman the same answer; but was there in her heart a love for him that steeled it against all others? Madeline wished she could answer in the negative, but she was honest with herself, and could not but admit that, in spite of all, no man but he had won a place in her heart. Yet his engagement to another woman, and his duplicity about it, must separate him from her forever. Well, women had suffered so before. Hard as it would be, she must tear from her heart a love that dishonored her, and must forget him. She wept over it, prayed for strength to do her difficult duty, and then, removing as far as she could the traces of tears from her face, she went about her daily duty with a softened, chastened spirit. Late that night, with Belle Havelock's letter, which she had read and reread, clasped in her hands, she was kneeling by her bedside, thanking and praising God, her face suffused with tears of mingled anguish and joy.

The same night was the supreme epoch of Hadley's life. He lay sleepless upon his bed, trying vainly to overcome the habit of sceptical doubt and attain that state of mind which Jesus so cogently described as that of a little child. Hadley could not reach it, and at last he fell into a troubled sleep. He had a strange dream. He was at college again, and preparing an address against the Bible, which was to be a masterpiece. His ambition was kindled; his determination to deal one crushing, overwhelming blow at the Book, which should once for all annihilate its influence in the college, was absorbing. Yet, with the common experience of dreams, he could not find his notes, could not put his hand on the books of reference he needed, nor even find writing-materials in his study. Suddenly some one was helping him. At one time it seemed to be his old friend, George Dane; at another it was Belle Havelock; again, it was a stranger of great learning and imposing appearance.

His confusion vanished, his books were in order, his notes arranged, and his guide was pointing with unerring finger to this and that powerful passage of anti-Biblical argument. He was elated, triumphant. Now he was dealing with the miracles, and quoting the miracle of the exorcising at Gadara. He turned to put a question to his new mentor, and was struck with amazement and terror. It was no man that had been helping him, but the Spirit of Evil himself. "Am I an amanuensis for the devil?" he cried in his dream. "Depart! In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, depart!" His own cry and his agitation awoke him. He was lying in cold perspiration and trembling from head to foot. In a few minutes he passed from the dazed, confused condition of waking, into full intelligence and a realization that he had been dreaming, and of what.

Was it possible, he thought, that these doubts which had been distressing him and keeping him from peace and faith in Christ were suggested by Satan? It might be so. How weak and helpless was he, then, to contend against so wily and powerful an enemy! Was he a victim doomed to be Satan's prey? The possibility appalled him. He sank on his knees and prayed. Never before had he so felt his own weakness and utter helplessness without God. "O Jesus," he cried, "take me as I am, hold thou me, save me or I perish; I have no hope but in thee!" It was an absolute surrender! an unfaltering confidence in Christ's power and love, and it was followed by such peace and rest, and such a sense of joyful security, as no words could describe.

He returned to his bed and fell into a deep, refreshing slumber. As soon as it was light he was awake, dressed rapidly, read the Bible, and offered a prayer of joy and thanksgiving, and then hurried out to tell Hanson the glorious news. He found the clergyman, early as it was, engrossed at his desk. He looked up as Hadley entered, read on his face the intelligence he came to bring, and springing to his feet he grasped his hand.

"Madelling, my brother," he exclaimed, "you have been born again!"

"Yes, Hanson, nothing short of that, thank God!"

The two men sat down, and Hadley told his story, and then they knelt and offered their united praises to God. As they parted, their hands were clasped in the warm fraternal grip that he alone fully understands who gives his hand to a brother in Christ. As Hadley went through his duties that day, a warm glow of joy and happiness seemed to radiate from his heart throughout his whole being. "'The peace of God,' he murmured once, 'which passeth all understanding.' Yes, that is it; mine now and throughout eternity."

That night he took up Belle Havelock's letter and opened it. It could do no harm now. As Mr. Hanson's business friend had said to him, now he knew; it was no longer speculation or opinion or religious views: he knew. But what was this? Belle's style had changed. "This letter," she began, "costs me more pain, more shame and humiliation, than any act of my life. I have done you a cruel, bitter wrong and caused suffering to you and another, and I can have no peace nor rest until I have borne the pain of doing what I can to atone for my sin. To Miss Winters I am making a similar confession and I implore both to forgive me if it is possible."

Belle then fell into the narrative style and told a surprising story. It appeared that she had continued attending Mr. Mardont's ministry after Hadley left college, and, recently, that earnest preacher whose sermons had so stirred Hadley had penetrated the armor of agnosticism in which Belle's soul was wrapped. A long, agitating struggle followed, and she had been unable to find peace until she had resolved to make a full and complete confession of a sin that lay heavily on her conscience. She was persuaded that God had forgiven her, and now she wished to confess to the two persons she had wronged, and to beg their pardon.

Then followed a circumstantial and detailed history of the plot which, with Duneman's assistance, she had engineered for Hadley's discomfiture, and with which the reader is already familiar. She assumed responsibility for it all, and dwelt but slightly on Duneman's share in it. In conclusion she said: "May I venture to hope for your forgiveness? It ill becomes me to offer advice to you after such a confession as this, but my experience of the past few days forces me to offer you counsel, which, if you take it, will bring you happiness infinitely greater than the misery I have caused you. It is that you will take all your doubts and difficulties to Christ. Agnosticism and infidelity will bring you, as it has me, nothing but sorrow and disquiet. Do as I have done, and you will find peace. Then you will, perhaps, be able, when you think of me, to say, 'I forgive her.'"

"There is nothing too difficult for the grace of God to accomplish!" said Hadley, when he had read the last sentence of the remarkable communication. "The change in myself is no less extraordinary than that produced in the character of Belle Havelock. Once I should not have been able to forgive her, but now I can."

"But Madeline must have received her letter from Belle by this time."

What possibilities might follow in the wake of that fact! The thought thrilled him. If she loved him, she might still be his own. But the prospect was too transporting to be indulged. He would not allow himself to be too sanguine, lest the disappointment which might follow would blight his life. Since the love of God had taken possession of his heart, he felt that he loved Madeline with a stronger, holier fervor than ever before.

After dark he arranged his toilet, and putting Belle Havelock's letter into his pocket, he walked slowly toward the Winters' residence; his hand was on the door-bell, but his courage almost failed him, and he paused, stood irresolute, glancing up and down the street. Presently, however, he rang the bell lightly.

The door opened, and he was ushered by a servant into the parlor. There was no one in the room, and he sent his card to Madeline.

Presently he heard a light footstep in an adjoining room. His pulses stood still with suspense. The next moment the door was thrown open, and there stood Madeline, radiant and smiling, with the beautiful roses blooming on her cheeks. To the excited lover that smile meant welcome, and those blushes meant—love.

"Madeline, Madeline!" he exclaimed, rising, and stepping forward toward her, as she crossed the room to greet him.

She extended her hand, but he impetuously took both her hands in a warm clasp, and looking at her, he tried to read her secret in her eyes. The ingenuous girl could not conceal her feelings.

"Madeline, have you received a letter from Belle Havelock?" he asked.

"I have."

"And what have you to say—"

"That God is very good to us."

"My darling, you will be mine at last?"

"In heart I have been yours for—for—"

"My dear, dear Madeline!" and he took her unresisting form to his arms, and held her in a long, clinging embrace, while he pressed his lips to her brow and lips.

Then they sat down together and read Belle's letters over again, and many explanations and sweet but delicately embarrassing confessions had to be made. The hours sped happily. When he was ready to take his leave, he said:

"Madeline, dearest, my happiness is more than I deserve, and I can scarcely bear so much felicity."

"Perhaps if we put our strength together we can manage to carry the onerous burden," she said, with sweet naïveté.

"You are the same ingenuous girl I used to know at college."

A few days later he was in the company of his uncle, when the latter said: "Hadley, you believe the Gospel now!"

"With all my heart."

"Will you preach it?"

The question was sprung upon him so suddenly that he was not prepared to answer at once. He paced the floor thoughtfully for a few minutes, and finally said:

"Let me think the matter over for a few days. The vocation is a great and responsible one, and I do not wish to rush into it with undue haste."

"That is right. Think and pray about it."

In a few days he had revolved the subject in his mind thoroughly, and came to his uncle to announce his decision.

"I have come," he said, "to inform you that I have concluded to enter the ministry."

The joy of his uncle was inexpressible. "Thank God!" he said, reverently. "My place will soon be vacated, and now God has raised up a man to fill it when I am gone. But what are your plans?"

"One thing is evident," replied Hadley, positively. "I cannot think of preaching until I have taken a theological course of studies in some good seminary. I have had some literary training, but I am densely ignorant of the Scripture and of theology."

"Your head as well as your heart is in the right place. When will you go?"

"After the holidays. I dislike to resign my position in the schools of this place, but 'necessity is laid upon me; woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.'"

Both Mr. Bidder and Mr. Hanson approved of Hadley's course. But he had still one more task to perform. However, with his characteristic promptness, he went that evening to see Madeline, and when they were alone, he said:

"Madeline, I have decided to enter the ministry. It is right that you should know what my chosen calling in life is to be, and I ask you now whether you are willing to share with me in the toil, sacrifices, and joys of the vocation to which God has called me."

Without a moment's faltering the girl replied, quoting Ruth's resolute words to her mother-in-law: "The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me!"

"But, Madeline," he continued, tentatively, "I must go to a seminary for three years before I can make you—my—my—wife."

"Dear Hadley, that is just what I should have advised you to do," she answered smilingly. "The times demand a ministry that is thoroughly trained, and I want you to be as useful as possible in our Master's service. My love has stood a severer test than an absence of a few years for so noble a purpose."

The three years sped rapidly. During Hadley's absence at the theological school, he was informed by Madeline that Hanson had been called to a position of wider usefulness in one of the largest cities in the Middle States, and although he was loath to leave the people with whom he had labored so long, he felt that he ought to obey the call.

A few months before Hadley had completed his theological studies, he was summoned to the city in which his spiritual birth had taken place, to attend the obsequies of his beloved uncle, Mr. Bidder, and before the young man went back to his seminary work, he received a unanimous call to become the deceased clergyman's successor. Thus the veteran's desires had received their accomplishment.

Events must be hurriedly passed over. One evening, six months later, Hadley Madelling and his wife (née Madeline Winters) were sitting in the young pastor's study, talking over the vital interests of the work upon which they had entered. Hadley had just returned from an annual meeting of the clergymen of his denomination, which had been held in another part of the State. Presently Madeline said:

"Hadley, I have pleasant news for you."

"Well?" (interrogative inflection.)

"Mr. Hanson is married."

"Married! And who is the bride worthy of such a husband?"

"I do not know her, but I am told she is an excellent, devoted, and cultivated lady, and —not at all wealthy."

"Good! but I have an item of news to match it," said Hadley, gleefully. "Whom do you suppose I met on the train as I was returning from the meeting?"

"I am no expert at guessing."

"Mr. Mardont, the preacher whom we used to admire so much at college."

"Did he give you much news about the dear old place?"

"Column after column. But there was one item of special interest. During our conversation I said: 'I suppose that you know Miss Havelock—Belle Havelock?' 'Oh, yes,' he answered, with a curious smile that I could not interpret. 'Well,' said I, 'she was an admirable girl, but the most bitter infidel, at one time, that I ever met; but I have learned that she has been converted. I wonder how she is succeeding in her Christian life.' 'Very well,' he replied, with the same peculiar smile: 'she is one of the most devoted Christian workers of the town of Bromfield.' 'I am glad to hear it. Is she still unmarried?' I asked. A droll laugh escaped his lips, and then he replied, 'Belle Havelock is now Mrs. Mardont.'"

"Madeline laughed gaily as she said, "And she used to despise preachers so!"

"Well, I quizzed Mardont about that, and is reply was characteristic: 'Belle says frankly hat there was a time when she scorned me eartily, on account of my profession; but after er conversion, her eyes were opened, and she egan to see—well—merits, you know'—he said, ith a jocose expression—'that had previously scaped her notice, and so her prejudices were appily overcome.'"

"I am so happy to hear of Belle's conversion," aid Madeline, with tears in her eyes. "But here still remains one of the two sceptics at he college who has not been reclaimed."

"Ah, you mean George Dane. Well, I shall t down right away and write to him."

And Hadley seated himself at his desk and enned his friend Dane a long letter. It was ast midnight before he had finished it.

THE END.

GIDEON'S ARMY.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

. S. Lesson for Dec. 9, Judges 7: 1-23. Golden Text, Zech. 4: 6.

he Nation Sinning and Suffering—Their Cry Reaching the Ears of God—He Prepares a Deliverer—An Obscure Farmer's Son Selected—The Inspiring Assurance—Made Him the Equal of Moses—His Weak Faith Borne With and Strengthened—Fidelity in the Family Required—The Reformer Unpopular—His Father's Logical Defence—An Army Gathered—Gideon's Dependence on God for Direction—The Test of Courage Applied—The Second Test for the Consecrated—The Night Attack—Panic and Rout—The Source of Gideon's Power.

IT was God who raised up judges to deliver is people: they were not self-made men, nor ere they educated in any earthly school. They ere needed and called for a special work. Gidon's call was to be a simple, willing instrument, ho should show forth, in his life-work, that uth which the great apostle of the Gentiles arned in after years: "When I am weak, then n I strong." (II Cor. 12: 10.) Israel had sinned, d God delivered them into the hand of Midn seven years, until the land was spoiled by ese invaders, and the children of Israel could tain neither cattle nor harvest, nor could they safe in their own houses. Industry ceased; d very many tried to drag out a precarious istence in mountain dens and caves. At last ey began to cry unto the Lord, who sent a ophet to tell them of their sins. But that cry netrated the heart of a Father as well as a dge, and God set about preparing a deliverer. ere was nothing in Gideon's antecedents to ad to the supposition that he should become military leader. He was but the son of a mer, who farmed his own land, and probably had learned little beyond the tillage of the ound and the care of cattle. He says of himself, "My family is poor in Manasseh, and I am e least in my father's house." Should such a an deliver Israel? But the first word of God His call to him extinguished all his unfitness:

"The Lord is With Thee, ou mighty man of valor." This made everything possible to this weak and ordinary man. is put him on a level with Moses and Joshua, d all things became possible to him, because ll things are possible to him that believeth." Even when repeatedly assured by God that was with him, Gideon's faith was so weak it he required a sign that God talked with n; so that it was not the strength of his faith, t the might of the presence of Jehovah with n, which made him victorious. Even when had the sign he asked for, and his offering s accepted, Gideon feared, and God reassured n in saying unto him, "Peace be unto thee: r not; thou shalt not die." When God sent him a mission, in the first place, to overturn the latry in his own house and family, and comnded him to throw down the altar of Baal ich his father had made, and to cut down the ve (or Asherah, a kind of wooden image) that by it, he so feared his father's household and men of the city, that he could not do it by , yet he did it by night. His timidity and orance were not made an excuse for disdience, but a reason for leaning upon the Lord. No weakness or incapacity of any kind is an excuse for neglecting the known will of God.

His Will is Our Power.

When the weakest Christian is true to God in his own family, because he knows God is with him, the Lord will make him a power greater than he knows. Natural power, talents, and education are only useful to God as they are surrendered to Him; natural weakness of character, and want of ability, are only a hindrance to God when they are made an excuse for not obeying Him.

There is no true service of God which does not provoke persecution. The men of Abiezer soon found out that the image of their god was destroyed, and an altar set up unto the Lord in the house of Gideon's father. And, with one consent, they demanded this new-made reformer, that he might be slain. But God has a voice in all which regards His children. "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations." (II Pet. 2: 9.) He was at no loss as to how Gideon was to be rescued—God works by the most unlikely means; the very father who was the great patron of Baal worship in Abiezer was the instrument chosen of God for his defence. Although Gideon's action had been a direct reproof to his father's idolatry, yet Joash takes up his cause, and says to those who were about him: "Will ye plead for Baal? will ye save him. . . . If he be a god, let him plead for himself, because one hath thrown down his altar." A god who cannot take care of himself is no god for us to worship. Thus Gideon saw the hand of God, the Spirit of God came upon him, he blew a trumpet, and Abiezer, the city which but an hour ago sought his life, "was gathered after him, and he saw himself at the head of an army." Thus in twenty-four hours God had made Gideon what He called him, a "mighty man of valor." He sent messengers to Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali, "and they came up to meet them." But now, what should he do with such an army? Gideon did the wisest thing possible: he went alone with God and secured from Him, through a double sign, the assurance that He would deliver Israel by his hand.

But Gideon never asked God for a plan of campaign, or for any knowledge of what he was to do, beforehand. He counted God equal to the management of the war. The Israelitish army was now pitched by the well of Harod, with the Midianites on their north flank.

The First Direction

given to Gideon was this: "The people that are with thee are too many for Me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against Me, saying, "Mine own hand hath saved me." In God's dealings with us, He has always two ends in view: He not only works the deliverance which may be the pressing necessity of the hour, but, at the same time, He regulates our relations to Him, and so carries on our education. Israel had sinned; it was of grace that they were permitted to rally to the standard of the Lord at all, and He would teach them that their deliverance was wholly His doing, and no credit to them any way. The first thinning of the ranks took place when the proclamation was made, "Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return." O what a sifting! Out of thirty-two thousand, only ten thousand remained—less than one-third! So it is now; hardly one in three has the courage to trust God. Another test was applied, for God would thin the ranks again. This time it was neither the people who decided, nor yet Gideon, who should be approved.

God Tried Them.

He brought them down to the water, and the greater number (seven hundred) bowed down upon their knees to drink, while three hundred were contented to dip their hands in the water, and drink just so much as should suffice them. These were the chosen ones, the really consecrated—those who do not halt long by the way to drink of earthly waters. Now the army was equipped; there was not a fearful heart among them; there was not one whose personal concerns were put first, before the work of God. And the word of command, the word of deliverance, was once more given to Gideon. "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand."

Had Gideon been an accomplished warrior, he might have questioned whether he was not mad to go against the host of Midian with such a handful. But Gideon knew that the Lord of hosts was with him; how, then, should he fear? Gideon did not sleep that night, but his waking companion was God; and He called him to "arise, and get thee down unto the host, for [He said] I have delivered it into thine hand." He obeyed, and with Phurah, his servant, he went near enough to hear one of the Midianites tell a dream to his fellow—how he saw a cake of barley-bread fall on one of the tents and overturn it. And the man made answer: "This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash, a man of Israel, for into his hand hath God delivered Midian and all his host." When Gideon heard this, he did not hurry back until he had worshipped God.

Time is Never Lost in Worshipping God.

Guided by Him, he returned, aroused all his followers, supplied them with empty pitchers containing lamps, and trumpets, and commanded them, "Look on me, and do likewise." It was a novel equipment; there was nothing which demanded skill, but only faith and obedience. His men were in three companies, and approached the camp from three sides, just when the middle night-watch had been set. Gideon raised the trumpet to his lips, and in an instant, on every side of the camp the sound of the trumpet was heard, but nothing was to be seen. Then, with a loud crash, three hundred pitchers were shivered into atoms, and three hundred lamps lit up the faces of the trumpeters. The sleeping Midianites arose half awake, and seized their swords, and, not knowing friend from foe in the dazzle of the lamps and the intervening darkness, they fell one upon another throughout the host, until, with one general movement, they burst through the children of Israel, and fled.

The news soon got abroad that the Midianites had been routed, and those who had been fearful and afraid, now that they found victory on the side of Israel, arose and helped in the pursuit. Then Gideon sent to Ephraim that they should take the waters before the Midianites, unto Bethbarah and Jordan, so as to cut off their retreat on that side. And the Ephraimites arose, took the waters, and slew two Midianitish princes, Oreb and Zeeb. When the Ephraimites contended with him, it was Gideon's humility which appeased their anger, and he passed on with his unbroken little band of three hundred, faint, yet pursuing, until the Midianites were utterly discomfited.

Thus were the words of the prophet fulfilled: "Not by might, not by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." "I can't" is a Poor Excuse for a Christian.

Paul said, "I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me." I can be patient through Christ, which strengtheneth me; I can be firm through Christ, which strengtheneth me; I can cease from anxiety through Christ, which strengtheneth me; I can win souls through Christ, which strengtheneth me; yes, I can give up my will through Christ, which strengtheneth me; I can endure injustice through Christ, which strengtheneth me. Gideon's strength lay in his certainty that God was to be depended on, and he was perfectly willing to be put at a disadvantage in numbers if it was part of the plan of God. We see how dependent he was on God all the time, making no move without settling things with God. Oh, how rapidly God develops things as soon as He has his children quite subject to Him, quite ready to His hand! There are no Midianites in the heart, in the family or the Church, in the shop or in the Bible-class, in the business or elsewhere, whom the Lord will not discomfit if we will only take the exact place God gives us as His fellow-workers.

Let me not die before I've done for Thee
My earthly work, whatever it may be;
Call me not hence with mission unfulfilled,
Let me not leave my space of ground untilled.

Impress this truth upon me, that not one
Can do my portion that I leave undone;
For each one in Thy vineyard hath a spot—
To labor in for life—and weary not,
Then give me strength all faithfully to toil,
Converting barren earth to fruitful soil.

long to be an instrument of Thine
To gather worshippers unto Thy shrine;
To be the means one human soul to save
From the dark terrors of a hopeless grave.

Yet most I want a spirit of content,
To work where'er Thou'lt wish my labor spent,
Whether at home or in a stranger clime,
In days of joy, or in sorrow's sterner time.

want a spirit passive, to be still,
And by Thy power to do Thy holy will;
And when the prayer unto my lips doth rise,—
Before a new home doth my soul surprise,— Let me accomplish some great work for Thee;"

ubdue it, Lord; let my petition be.
Oh make me useful in this world of Thine
s ways according to Thy will, not mine.
all me not hence with mission unfulfilled et me not leave my space of ground untilled, et me not die until I've done for Thee, y earthly work, whatever it may be."

The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M. P. and Sir W. Foster, M. P.—The Welcome to the Ex-Premier in the Birmingham Town Hall.

THE RT. HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

His Recent Ovation in Birmingham—Birth, and Early Life—Enters Parliament—The Protege of Sir Robert Peel—His First Book—Classical Lore—Lord Macaulay's Estimate of Him—Changes his Party—Becomes Premier in 1866—Vicissitudes of Official Life—Personal Affairs.

THE attitude Mr. Gladstone has taken in Irish politics, and his earnest desire to give to Ireland a government similar to that of one of our States, has won for him a large measure of popular approval on this side of the Atlantic. At times his speeches and official acts have been exasperating to the American public, but the Irish policy he has adopted has made him, with as least a large section of our people, the most popular of living English statesmen. It has, however, alienated from him many of his most ardent admirers and supporters in his own country, and especially has aroused against him the opposition of the Evangelical and Protestant members of the community, who fear that if his programme were carried out, the Protestants of Ireland would be crushed by the great Roman Catholic majority. His new departure, therefore, has disunited the great Liberal party, and even in the Liberal strongholds Mr. Gladstone now is only supported by a section of the party. The most remarkable instance is that of Birmingham, which has always been the most stalwart of Liberal towns, but now sends to Parliament the most determined opponents Mr. Gladstone has in the House. It was, therefore, somewhat remarkable that his recent visit to that town should have called forth so much enthusiasm, and it proves that even there his brilliant genius and commanding abilities still exert an influence, and the magic of his eloquence is still felt. As a full narrative of his life was published in these columns some three years ago, it is unnecessary to do more than briefly summarize its leading facts in connection with his portrait, which is given on the preceding page, with the portrait of Sir W. Foster, his host in Birmingham, and the picture of the enormous meeting which gathered in the townhall to give him vociferous welcome.

William Ewart Gladstone was born Dec. 29, 1809. He is, therefore, in his seventy-ninth year.

At the Age of Twelve

(in September, 1821) he was entered at Eton College, where the education at that time was largely confined to classics and Latin and Greek compositions; but there were there with him many scholars who afterward achieved fame in public life. Young Gladstone was a studious boy, and became a sound classical scholar.

He entered Christ Church College, Oxford, as a student in 1829, remaining there until 1831, leaving at Michaelmas in that year with distinguished educational honors—a Double First in Classics and Mathematics. While there he exhibited an almost superhuman industry, and a wonderful aptitude for learning, neither of which has in the least abated or become dimmed in his subsequent career; but, on the contrary, they have increased with his years.

After leaving the University of Oxford, he spent a year in a continental tour, which period was devoted to the study of men, manners, and things in the various countries of Europe. In 1831 he entered Parliament as a Conservative member for Newark. He had been in "the House" but two years when Sir Robert Peel, then Prime Minister, appointed him to the unimportant post of a junior Lordship of the Treasury. In the next year, 1835, he was appointed Under-Secretary for Colonial Affairs. But as Sir Robert Peel's ministry was only four months in office, Mr. Gladstone, with his chief, was soon sitting on the opposition benches.

His First Book.

Relieved of official duties, Mr. Gladstone devoted his leisure to the production of a book, which, at its appearance, created a profound sensation throughout Great Britain. It was entitled, "The State in its Relations with the Church." During the same period of exclusion from office he devoted himself with delight to his classical studies. He was then, and still is, a master of the language and literature of Greece and Rome. He has published Latin sacred verses not appreciably inferior in grace to those of Buchanan or Milton, and as a Homeric student his "Studies of Homer and the Homeric Age" entitles him to a well-earned niche among scholarly critics. Classical study is with him a delightful pleasure, and it is related of him that on one occasion, when his seat in Parliament hung in the balance, and he was the prey of torturing anxiety, he shut himself in his study on the decisive polling-day, and spent the anxious hours in translating Homer. He is credited with having written the most elegant Latin translation of Toplady's hymn, "Rock of Ages," to relieve the weariness of a dull debate, while sitting on the Government benches in "the House."

In 1839, when he was becoming prominent in Parliament, Lord Macaulay wrote of him: "He is a young man of unblemished character, and of distinguished Parliamentary talents, the rising hope of those stern and unbending Tories who follow reluctantly and mutinously a leader whose experience and eloquence are indispensable to them, but whose cautious temper and moderate opinions they abhor. . . . But we believe we do him no more than justice when we say that his abilities and his demeanor have obtained for him the respect and good-will of all parties." Since that was written, Mr. Gladstone has made rapid strides upward, leaving the quagmire of Toryism far behind him. Now, instead of being the rising hope of the Tories, he is their dread and aversion.

Official Work.

In 1841 Mr. Gladstone came back to office, again under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel, and occupied for two years the subordinate position of Vice-President of the Board of Trade. He then stepped into the office of President of the same department, a position in which his ability began to have weight in the ministerial councils.

When the Government, in 1846, proposed the Repeal of the Corn Laws, he resigned his seat for Newark, because the Duke of Newcastle, who owned the borough, and who was his patron, held anti-repeal views. Upon his re-entering Parliament for the University of Oxford, he threw the weight of his great debating power into the scale in favor of University Reform and the Removal of Jewish Disabilities. Up to that time no Jew could occupy a seat in Parliament, or hold any office under the Crown.

Mr. Gladstone had been known as a Conservative, but in 1851 he finally severed himself from the great Conservative party; and in the same year he was called by purely domestic circumstances to Naples. There his humanity was stirred to its very core by the unheard-of brutalities of King Bomba, who had imprisoned twenty thousand of his subjects without trial. His passionate cry for redress sounded throughout the civilized world.

In 1852, when Lord Derby became Prime Minister, Mr. Gladstone declined to join his Ministry; and the Budget, which was propounded by Mr. Disraeli, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was so severely criticized by Mr. Gladstone that Lord Derby's Conservative Ministry was overthrown. Lord Aberdeen then formed a Liberal Government, of which Mr. Gladstone became and in 1853 he made his first great financial speech, bringing forward a Budget. After the dissolution of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet, in 1853, Mr. Gladstone did not take any prominent part in Parliamentary affairs for several years, but occupied himself a good deal in literary studies. In the Administration of 1859 Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was instrumental in the repeal of the paper duty, and in negotiating the commercial treaty with France. At the general election of 1865 he was defeated at the University of Oxford, but he was elected for Southwest Lancashire. In the election of 1868, however, he lost his seat after a fierce contest, which excited the most intense interest throughout the country. His victorious opponent was this time Mr. Cross, who became Secretary for the Home Department. This event, however, did not exclude him from Parliament as the electors of Greenwich had a few days previously elected him by a large majority. He was subsequently elected by the Mid-Lothian district in Scotland, which he still represents.

When the death of Lord Palmerston took place, in 1866, Mr. Gladstone became of England, and brought in a Reform Bill. He was, however displaced by Mr. Disraeli's Ministry for two years; but again, in December, 1868, became Prime Minister, and in 1869 the Irish Church Disestablishment Act was passed.

In January, 1874, Mr. Gladstone dissolved Parliament, and at the general election, which ensued, the votes were, for the first time, taken by secret ballot. The result was that 351 Conservative members were elected, and only 302 Liberals. Hence Mr. Gladstone at once resigned, and Mr. Disraeli, afterward Lord Beaconsfield, became Prime Minister. In April, 1880, Mr. Gladstone again became Premier, and held office until June, 1885, when he was succeeded by the Marquis of Salisbury. On February 6, 1886, he again resumed office as Premier, but in August of that year the verdict of the country on his Irish policy was against him, and he again gave place to Lord Salisbury.

Private Life.

Mr. Gladstone is an early riser, and when at Hawarden Castle, his country residence, may be seen, shortly after 8 o'clock in the morning, walking down to prayers in the village church, where his son ministers. Early devotion and breakfast over, he gives the remainder of the morning, till the gong sounds for luncheon at 2 o'clock, to work, reading, writing, meditation, or to the performance of arithmetical feats which no Cabinet Minister has ever surpassed, or, in the proper season, to a bout of tree-felling, at which he is an expert. After luncheon more reading follows, and in due time he shows himself at dinner, to be "a singularly temperate man in meat and drink."

Although he is the best controller of the National Exchequer that England has ever had, and is notoriously by no means a wealthy man, his personal charities are almost reckless. In the course of his long walks in the neighborhood of Hawarden his pockets have an astonishing knack of emptying themselves, and amusing stories are told of his having had to walk home inconvenient distances of ten and twelve miles in the dark because of his inability to raise so much as a railway fare. As Prime Minister he refused an increase of salary, and it is not generally known that he has never drawn the pension to which he is legally entitled since his retirement from office, showing plainly that he has no desire to become rich, or even to increase his comforts, at the nation's expense.

His piety is, in its manifestations, of a humble and unaffected character. Even when Prime Minister of England he has been found in the humblest houses, reading to the sick or dying consolatory passages of Scripture in his own soft, melodious tones.

Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden.

Hawarden Park, in Wales, in the centre of which stands Hawarden Castle, Mr. Gladstone's residence, is one of the finest country-seats in Great Britain. Visitors who arrive at Hawarden for the first time are surprised at the extent of the grounds, and the beauty of the Park. Hawarden Park, with Hawarden Castle, came to Mr. Gladstone with his wife. When Mr. Gladstone married, he had no intention of making his seat in Wales, but finding that Sir Stephen Glynne, his wife's father, was in circumstances which rendered it disadvantageous to the family for him to live in the Castle, Mr. Gladstone bought some of the land, and took up his quarters with his father-in-law in the Castle, which had been temporarily closed. This arrangement lasted for many years, and was attended with none of the disagreeable consequences which so often happen when two generations live under one roof. The two families lived side by side, and nothing could exceed the harmony of the united households. Sir S. Glynne always sat at the head of the table, while Mrs. Gladstone sat at the other end; Mr. Gladstone sat between. This arrangement continued down to the death of Sir Stephen Glynne, and it was rather curious to see a statesman whose name and whose fame were familiar throughout the world, always taking the second place in his own house. But for the somewhat embarrassed circumstances of Sir Stephen Glynne, which led Mr. Gladstone to buy up some of his estate, it was his intention to have bought an estate in Scotland, to which he has always been strongly attached.

The Library at Hawarden

is one of the finest private libraries in the country. It consists of more than 20,000 volumes, and considerable curiosity exists as to what Mr. Gladstone intends to do with this collection of books after his death. Contrary to the usual practice obtaining in magnificent private libraries, Mr. Gladstone allows his books to be lent out to almost any one in the neighbourhood who wishes to read them. At one time this liberty was unlimited; any one could take a book out and keep it an indefinite period, provided that he simply left an acknowledgment of having borrowed the book. This privilege, however, was so much abused by some persons, that a few years ago a rule was laid down limiting the time for which a book might be kept to one month. With that exception, however, the Hawarden library is still the free loan library of the country-side.

Mr. Gladstone's Father.

It is not generally known that if Mr. Gladstone had not been swayed by a very stong sense of filial duty he would never have entered Parliament, his own strong predisposition being to take orders and go into the Church. This desire his father strongly opposed, as he wished him to enter Parliament and serve his country in the Legislature. Mr. Gladstone reluctantly but loyally obeyed. Another incident, which is not generally known, is that it was the same principle of filial obedience which first brought to light that extraordinary aptitude for figures which enables Mr. Gladstone to be far and away the greatest Chancellor of the Exchequer whom England has ever had. When he was at Oxford he wrote home saying that he didn't care for mathematics, and intended to concentrate his attention upon classics. His father wrote back that he heard with much grief his son's decision. He did not think a man was a man unless he knew mathematics. Mr. Gladstone, on receiving this intimation of his father's wishes, abandoned his own plan, and applied himself with his usual concentration to the study of mathematics. Much to his surprise he came out double first. He often said in after life that he had done it to please his father, and that he would never have been Chancellor of the Exchequer had it not been for the bent given to his mind by his compliance with his father's wish that he should pursue mathematical studies.

The Town Hall,

Birmingham, was crowded to excess, when the Liberal leader was presented with an address by the President of the local Liberal Association. Mr. Gladstone, in reply, spoke for an hour and forty minutes, and said he did not intend to retire from public life so long as the Irish Question remained unsolved. Birmingham Town Hall holds between 3,000 and 4,000 people, and has been the scene of many memorable political and religious meetings. Mr. John Bright, M. P., and Mr. Chamberlain, M. P., and other politicians have on various occasions addressed crowded political meetings in it. There have also been large religious meetings held in it in the past by the Rev. Charles Leach on the Sundays of the winter months for some years. The lady evangelist, Miss McLatchie, also addressed large audiences in it a few years ago.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Religion That is Moonshine.—"There was a man who, in answer to one who was trying to persuade him to trust Christ, and to rest on His blessed promises, replied, 'What is the use? Your religion is all moonshine.' 'Yes,' said the Christian, 'in one sense that is so. As the moon has no light in herself, but only reflects on the earth the glorious rays of the sun, so we, with no light or goodness of our own, only reflect upon men the glorious light of holiness which comes from the Sun of Righteousness!' Christians would do well to remember that they have no light of their own, and it is only by keeping themselves looking unto Jesus that they can be of use in Christ's work."

Sunset Time in the Alps.—Mr. W. D. Dunn, remarks that "In the evening the Swiss cowherds on the Alps watch the sun go down, and he who is highest, just as the glorious orb sinks, puts his horn to his mouth, and blows a lusty note, giving praise to the Lord. This is at once taken up by a second, a little below, who repeats the shout; then a third follows, until it goes right down the mountain, and throughout the valley—a blast of praise to God. If the churches would similarly unite and with one great shout of praise to the Lord cast aside their petty differences, and, shoulder to shoulder, face the great army of sin and Satan, then Christ's kingdom would progress, and numbers of lost sheep be gathered into the fold."

The Giver Rather than the Gift.—"The Rev. Mr. Hudson Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, tells that at one time at a Christian Convention he met a young lady with whom he was slightly acquainted. With a face radiant with joy, she said to him, 'Oh, Mr. Taylor, I have got it, I have got salvation!' and she proceeded to speak of it, and of her joy and peace. A few days later, he again met the lady, and this time her face showed only too clearly that she had lost her joy. He went away to China, and after laboring there some time, came back, and among the first people he met was that same lady. A smile of gladness and sweet content lighted up her face; she was quite ready to speak, not this time about it, but about Him. The first time she had only looked at the gift and not at the Donor, and she was resting on her feelings and not solely on her Saviour. God wants His children to rest only in His Son, whom He glorifies, and whom we, if we are to be pleasing to God, must also glorify."

A Memorable Hour of Freedom.—The Rev. Mr. Munro relates: "In the island of Antigua, on the last night of their slavery, the slaves gathered into the churches there to await the hour of legislated emancipation. Many of the whites anticipated a night of riot, as the slaves had not been treated in anything like a generous manner, and it was feared that they might take the first opportunity of wreaking vengeance upon their former taskmasters. Instead, the negroes met in the churches, and, as 12 o'clock approached, knelt in prayer. When the hour chimed, with a shout of joy they rose to their feet and shouted praise to God who had given them their liberty. Then leaving the churches they went towards their homes, leaping and laughing for joy that they were free. Yet they had only escaped from slavery of the body. And there are many free-born men who are groaning under that old taskmaster, Satan, who keeps them in abject slavery chained by their own sins. To such we offer freedom, not in the future, but now."

Mr. Moody and the Modern Athenian.—Mr. Murch says: "One of Mr. Moody's great gatherings was interrupted by a man, crying from the audience, 'Tell us something new! tell us something new!' Mr. Moody stopped instantly in his discourse, and turning to Mr. Sankey, who sat beside him, said, 'Mr. Sankey, will you please sing that grand old hymn, "Tell me the old, old story"?' Mr. Sankey did so, and with wonderful effect. When it was finished, Mr. Moody said to the man who had interrupted, 'You ask me for something new; and I give you the old, old story, ever new.' It was the means of leading him to Christ. How many, like this man, will not accept the simple message of the Gospel; it is too old and simple for them. Like the Athenians of ancient times, who spent their time on the Areopagus, 'in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing' (Acts 17. 21), they must have something new to tickle their intellectual palate. We have nothing but Christ to offer. He is the only sacrifice for sin, and He alone can do helpless sinners good."

Deciding to Become a Child of Satan.—Mr. Hamilton remarks: "A young fellow whom I met at an evangelistic meeting recently, testified thus: 'In 1882 I went to a Gospel meeting in a small town near Glasgow. The minister was speaking of the terrible doom that awaited the sinner, and as I listened, I trembled. I knew he was describing what would be my fate if I did not repent. The preacher spoke to me afterwards, and urged me to give myself to Christ. I would not then decide, but went home determined to be a Christian soon. Next day I began my Christian career, and that same day I fell into sin several times. Satan whispered, 'You a Christian? You will never be one, you are nothing but a miserable sham! For three days and nights I was intensely miserable, striving to be a Christian, and continually failing. Then I deliberately decided to become a child of the devil. I mingled with evil company, and was soon rapidly traversing the road to hell. I disgraced myself and ran off to sea, where I continued to serve Satan; and well he paid me. I remember standing on the vessel's side, and wondering whether I should throw myself into the sea or not, and thus end my miserable existence. But just then God whispered to my soul, "After death, the judgment." I was afraid to die. Then it seemed that God showed me His great love for me, and my own wickedness in rejecting His mercy. I turned to Him as my only hope, and resting my weary soul on Him found rest.'"

The Broken Oar and the Safe Anchor.—The Rev. Dr. Kneeland related: "A short time ago a man was rowing on the St. Lawrence River, just above the fatal rapids. Intent upon other things, he absent-mindedly rowed along until he was startled to find that he had drifted into water where the current was strong, and he was being carried swiftly toward the rapids. Putting all thoughts aside but that of his imminent danger, he applied himself to the oars, and straining every muscle, he was able to hold his own, and even to creep up the river. But one of the oars, unable to stand the great strain, snapped close to the blade; and now he was helpless. At first he sat still in despair; but when he noticed an anchor lying in the bow of the boat, hope revived. He was not so far from the shore, he thought, but that he could throw that light anchor on some protruding part of the bank, and so keep himself from being borne down the rapids. He threw the anchor, but it did not reach the shore. Again he threw it with all possible force, but with a like result. A little ahead, there was an island jutting far out into the river; when he was opposite that, he, with an effort that threatened to upset his frail craft, launched the anchor with all his might. It caught in a hollow, and was wedged between two rocks. Will that little chain stand the great strain? Yes, it did; and slowly the man drew himself to the shore, assisted by some people who had gathered, and soon he stood among them safe. As the anchor and chain saved that man, so the Lord Jesus is the only Anchor that can save a sinner when he is carried down in the mad torrent of sin, which threatens to hurl him into eternal darkness."

THE FRAGRANCE OF THE GOSPEL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, December 2, 1888.

"All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces." Ps. 45 :8.

The Costly Vestments in the Cathedral of Notre Dame—Christ's Kingly Robes—I. Odorous with Myrrh—One of the First Presents He Had—Its Interminable Perfume—A Type of Christ's Love—II. Odorous with Aloes—Significant of Bitterness—The Bitterness of Scourging, and the Cross—Denied Cradle and Death-bed—III. Odorous with Cassia—Healing and Curative—Unconscious Sufferers—Helpless Sufferers Brought by Friends—IV. The Ivory Palaces—Surpassing Beauty—Dead Children and Christian Friends There—A Mystery for Eternal Study.

AMONG the grand adornments of the city of Paris is the Church of Notre Dame, with its great towers and elaborated rose-windows, and sculpturing of the last Judgment, with the trumpeting angels and rising dead; its battlements of quatre-foil; its sacristy, with ribbed ceiling and statues of saints. But there was nothing in all that building which more vividly appealed to my plain republican tastes than the which lay in oaken presses—robes that had been embroidered with gold, and been worn by popes and archbishops on great occasions. There was a robe that had been worn by Pius VII. at the crowning of the first Napoleon. There was also a vestment that had been worn at the baptism of Napoleon II. As our guide opened the oaken presses, and brought out these vestments of fabulous cost, and lifted them up, the fragrance of the pungent aromatics in which they had been preserved, filled the place with a sweetness that was almost oppressive. Nothing that had been done in stone more vividly impressed me than these things that had been done in cloth, and embroidery, and perfume. But to-day I open the drawer of this text, and I look upon the kingly robes of Christ, and as I lift them, flashing with eternal jewels, the whole house is filled with the aroma of these garments, which smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

In my text

The King Steps Forth.

His robes rustle and blaze as He advances. His pomp and power and glory overmaster the spectator. More brilliant is He than Queen Vashti, moving amid the Persian princes; than Marie Antoinette, on the day when Louis XVI. put upon her the necklace of eight hundred diamonds; than Anne Boleyn, the day when Henry VIII. welcomed her to his palace—all beauty and all pomp forgotten, while we stand in the presence of this imperial glory, King of Zion, King of earth, King of Heaven, King forever! His garments not worn out, not dust-bedraggled; but radiant, and jewelled, and redolent. It seems as if they must have been pressed a hundred years amid the flowers of heaven. The wardrobes from which they have been taken must have been sweet with clusters of camphire, and frankincense, and all manner of precious wood. Do you not inhale the odors? Ay, ay. They "smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Your first curiosity is to know why the robes of Christ are Odorous With Myrrh.

This was a bright-leafed Abyssinian plant. It was trifoliated. The Greeks, Egyptians, Romans, and Jews bought and sold it at a high price. The first present that was ever given to Christ was a sprig of myrrh thrown on His infantile bed in Bethlehem, and the last gift that Christ ever had was myrrh pressed into the cup of His crucifixion. The natives would take a stone and bruise the tree, and then it would exude a gum that would saturate all the ground beneath. This gum was used for purposes of merchandise, One piece of it, no larger than a chestnut, would whelm a whole room with odors. It was put in closets, in chests, in drawers, in rooms, and its perfume adhered almost interminably to anything that was anywhere near it. So when in my text I read that Christ's garments smell of myrrh, I immediately conclude the exquisite sweetness of Jesus.

I know that to many He is only like any historical person; another John Howard; another pilanthropic Oberlin; another Confucius; a grand subject for a painting; a heroic theme for a poem; a beautiful form for a statue; but to those who have heard His voice, and felt his pardon, and received His benediction, He is music, and light, and warmth, and thrill, and sweet as a friend sticking to you when all else betray; lifting you up while others try to push you down; not so much like morning-glories, that bloom only when the sun is coming up, nor like "four-o'clocks," that bloom only when the sun is going down, but like myrrh, perpetally aromatic—the same morning, noon, and night; yesterday, to-day, forever. It seems as if we cannot wear Him out. We put on Him all our burdens, and afflict Him with all our griefs, and set Him foremost in all our battles; and yet He is ready to lift, and to sympathize, and to help. We have so imposed upon Him that one would think in eternal affront He would quit our soul; and yet to-day He addresses us with the same tenderness, dawns upon us with the same smile, pities us with the same compassion.

There is no name like His for us. It is more imperial than Caesar's, more musical than Beethoven's, more conquering than Charlemagne's, more eloquent than Cicero's. It throbs with all life. It weeps with all pathos. It groans with all pain. It stoops with all condescension. It breathes with all perfume. Who like Jesus to set a broken bone, to pity a homeless orphan, to nurse a sick man, to take a prodigal back without any scolding, to illumine a cemetery all ploughed with graves, to make a queen unto God out of the lost woman, to catch the

in a lachrymatory that shall never be broken? Who has such an eye to see our need, such a lip to kiss away our sorrow, such a hand to snatch us out of the fire, such a foot to trample our enemies, such a heart to embrace all our necessities? I struggle for some metaphor with which to express Him: He is not like the bursting forth of a full orchestra; that is too loud. He is not like the sea when lashed to rage by the tempest; that is too boisterous; He is not like the mountain, its brow wreathed with the lightnings; that is too solitary. Give us a softer type, a gentler comparison. We have seemed to see Him with our eyes, and to hear Him with our ears, and to touch Him with our hands. Oh that to-day He might appear to some other one of our five senses! Ay, the nostril shall discover His presence. He comes upon us like spice gales from Heaven. Yea, His garments smell of lasting and all-pervasive myrrh.

Oh that you all knew His sweetness! how soon you would turn from your novels. If the philosopher leaped out of his bath in a frenzy of joy, and clapped his hands, and rushed through the streets, because he had found the solution of a mathematical problem, how will you feel leaping from the fountain of a Saviour's mercy and pardon, washed clean, and made white as snow, when the question has been solved: "How can my soul be saved?" Naked, frost-bitten, storm-lashed soul, let Jesus this hour throw around thee the "garments that smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

Your second curiosity is to know why the robes of Jesus are Odorous with Aloes.

There is some difference of opinion about where these aloes grow, what is the color of the flower, what is the particular appearance of the herb. Suffice it for you and me to know that aloes mean bitterness the world over, and when Christ comes with garments bearing that particular odor, they suggest to me the bitterness of a Saviour's sufferings. Were there ever such nights as Jesus lived through—nights on the mountains, nights on the sea, nights in the desert? Who ever had such a hard reception as Jesus had? A hostelry the first, an unjust trial in oyer and terminer another, a foul-mouthed, yelling mob the last. Was there a space on His back as wide as your two fingers where He was not whipped? Was there a space on His brow an inch square where He was not cut of the briers? When the spike struck at the instep, did it not go clear through to the hollow of the foot? Oh, long, deep, bitter pilgrimage! Aloes! aloes!

John leaned his head on Christ, but who did Christ lean on? Five thousand men fed by the Saviour; who fed Jesus? The sympathy of a Saviour's heart going out to the leper and the adulteress; but who soothed Christ?

Denied both Cradle and Death-bed,

He had a fit place neither to be born nor to die. A poor babe! A poor lad! A poor young man! Not so much as a taper to cheer his dying hours. Even the candle of the sun snuffed out. Oh, was it not all aloes? All our sins, sorrows, bereavements, losses, and all the agonies of earth and hell picked up as in one cluster and squeezed into one cup, and that pressed to His lips, until the acrid, nauseating, bitter draught was swallowed with a distorted countenance, and a shudder from head to foot, and a gurgling strangulation. Aloes! aloes! Nothing but aloes. All this for Himself? All this to get the fame in the world of being a martyr? All this in a spirit of stubbornness, because he did not like Cæsar? No! no! All this because He wanted to pluck me and you from hell. Because He wanted to raise me and you to heaven. Because we were lost, and He wanted us found. Because we were blind, and He wanted us to see. Because we were serfs, and He wanted us manumitted. Oh, ye in whose cup of life the saccharine has predominated; oh, ye who have had bright and sparkling beverages, how do you feel toward Him who in your stead, and to purchase your disenthrallment, took the aloes, the unsavory aloes, the bitter aloes?

Your third curiosity is to know why these garments of Christ are Odorous With Cassia.

This was a plant which grew in India and the adjoining islands. You do not care to hear what kind of a flower it had or what kind of a stalk. It is enough for me to tell you that it was used medicinally. In that land and in that age, where they knew but little about pharmacy, cassia was used to arrest many forms of disease. So, when in my text we find Christ coming with garments that smell of cassia, it suggests to me the healing and curative power of the Son of God. "Oh," you say, "now you have a superfluous idea. We are not sick. Why do you want cassia? We are athletic. Our respiration is perfect. Our limbs are lithe, and in these cool days we feel we could bound like the roe." I beg to differ, my brother, from you. None of you can be better in physical health than I am, and yet I must say we are all sick. I have taken the diagnosis of your case, and have examined all the best authorities on the subject, and I have come now to tell you that you are full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, which have not been bound up, or mollified.

The Marasmus of Sin

is on us—the palsy the dropsy, the leprosy. The man that is expiring to-night in Fulton street—the allopathic and homeopathic doctors having given him up, and his friends now standing around to take his last words—is no more certainly dying as to his body than you and I are dying unless we have taken the medicine from God's Apothecary. All the leaves of this Bible are only so many prescriptions from the Divine Physician, written, not in Latin, like the prescriptions of earthly physicians, but written in plain English, so that a "man, though a fool, need not err therein." Thank God that the Saviour's garments smell of cassia!

Suppose a man were sick, and there was a phial on his mantel-piece with medicine he knew would cure him, and he refused to take it, what would you say of him? He is a suicide. And what do you say of that man who, sick in sin, has the healing medicine of God's grace offered him, and refuses to take it? If he dies, he is a suicide. People talk as though God took a man and led him out to darkness and death, as though He brought him up to the cliffs and then pushed him off. Oh, no! When a man is lost it is not because God pushes him off; it is because he jumps off. In olden times a suicide was buried at the cross-roads, and the people were accustomed to throw stones upon his grave. So it seems to me there may be in this house a man who is

and as though the angels of God were here to bury him at the point where the roads of life and death cross each other, throwing upon the grave the broken law and a great pile of misimproved privileges, so that those going by may look at the fearful mound, and learn what a suicide it is when an immortal soul, for which Jesus died puts itself out of the way.

When Christ trod this planet with foot of flesh, the people rushed after Him—people who were sick, and those who, being so sick they could not walk, were brought by their friends. Here I see a mother holding up her little child saying: "Cure this croup, Lord Jesus! Cure this scarlet fever!" And others: Cure this ophthalmia!

Give Ease and Rest

to this spinal distress! Straighten this club-foot!" Christ made every house where He stopped a dispensary. I do not believe that in the nineteen centuries that have gone by since, His heart has got hard. I feel that we can come now with all our wounds of soul and get His benediction. O Jesus! here we are. We want healing. We want sight. We want health. We want life. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." Blessed be God that Jesus Christ comes through this assemblage now, His "garments smelling of myrrh"—that means fragrance; "and aloes"—they mean bitter sacrificial memories; "and cassia"—that means medicine and cure.

According to my text, He comes "out of

The Ivory Palaces."

You know, or if you do not know, I will tell you now, that some of the palaces of olden time were adorned with ivory. Ahab and Solomon had their homes furnished with it. The tusks of African and Asiatic elephants were twisted into all manners of shapes, and there were stairs of ivory, and chairs of ivory, and tables of ivory, and floors of ivory, and pillars of ivory, and windows of ivory, and fountains that dropped into basins of ivory, and rooms that had ceilings of ivory. Oh white and overmastering beauty! Green tree branches sweeping the white curbs. Tapestry trailing the snowy floors. Brackets of light flashing on the lustrous surroundings. Silvery music rippling on the beach of the arches. The mere thought of it almost stuns my brain, and you say:

"Oh if I could only have walked over such floors! If I could have thrown myself in such a chair! If I could have heard the drip and dash of those fountains!" You shall have something better than that if you only let Christ introduce you. From that place He came, and to that place He proposes to transport you, for His "garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces."

What a Place Heaven Must Be!

The Tuileries of the French, the Windsor Castle of the English, the Spanish Alhambra, the Russian Kremlin, dungeons compared with it! Not so many castles on either side the Rhine as on both sides of the river of God—the ivory palaces! One for the angels, insufferably bright, winged, fire-eyed, tempest-charioted; one for the martyrs, with blood-red robes from under the altar; one for the King, the steps of His palace the crowns of the church militant; one for the singers, who lead the one hundred and forty and four thousand; one for you ransomed from sin; one for me, plucked from the burning. Oh, the ivory palaces!

To-day it seems to me as if the windows of those palaces were illumined for some great victory, and I look and see, climbing the stairs of ivory, and walking on floors of ivory, and looking from the windows of ivory, some whom we knew and loved on earth. Yes, I know them. There are father and mother, not eighty-two years and seventy-nine years, as when they left us, but blithe and young as when on their marriage day. And there are brothers and sisters, merrier than when we used to romp across the meadows together. The cough gone. The cancer cured. The erysipelas healed. The heart-break over. Oh, how fair they are in the ivory palaces! And your dear little

Children That Went Out From You—

Christ did not let one of them drop as He lifted them. He did not wrench one of them from you. No. They went as from one they loved well to One whom they loved better. If I should take your little child and press its soft face against my rough cheek, I might keep it a little while; but when you, the mother, came along, it would struggle to go with you. And so you stood holding your dying child when Jesus passed by in the room, and the little one sprang out to greet Him. That is all. Your Christian dead did not go down into the dust, and the gravel, and the mud. Though it rained all that funeral day, and the water came up to the wheel's hub as you drove out to the cemetery, it made no difference to them, for they stepped from the home here to the home there, right into the ivory palaces. All is well with them. All is well.

It is not a dead-weight that you lift when you carry a Christian out. Jesus makes the bed up soft with velvet promises, and He says: "Put her down here very gently. Put that head which will never ache again on this pillow of hallelujahs. Send up word that the procession is coming. Ring the bells. Ring! Open your gates, ye ivory palaces!" And so

Your Loved Ones are There.

They are just as certainly there, having died in Christ, as that you are here. There is only one thing more they want. Indeed, there is one thing in heaven they have not got. They want it. What is it? Your company. But oh, my brother, unless you change your tack you cannot reach that harbor. You might as well take the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, expecting in that direction to reach Toronto, as to go on in the way some of you are going, and yet expect to reach the ivory palaces. Your loved ones are looking out of the windows of heaven now, and yet you seem to turn your back upon them. You do not seem to know the sound of their voices as well as you used to, or to be moved by the sight of their dear faces. Call louder, ye departed ones! Call louder from the ivory palaces!

When I think of that place, and think of my entering it, I feel awkward; I feel as sometimes when I have been exposed to the weather, and my shoes have been bemired, and my coat is soiled, and my hair is disheveled, and I stop in front of some fine residence where I have an errand. I feel not fit and sit among the guests. So some of us feel about heaven. We need to be washed—we need to be rehabilitated before we go into the ivory palaces. Eternal God, let the surges of Thy pardoning mercy roll over us! I want not only to wash my hands and my feet, but, like some skilled diver, standing on the pier-head, who leaps into the wave and comes up at a far-distant point from where he went in, so I want to go down, and so I want to come up. O Jesus, wash me in the waves of Thy salvation!

And here I ask you to solve a mystery that has been oppressing me for thirty years. I have asked it of doctors of divinity who have been studying theology half a century, and they have given me no satisfactory answer. I have turned over all the books in my library, but got no solution to the question, and to-day I come and ask you for an explanation. By what logic was Christ induced to exchange the ivory palaces of heaven for the crucifixion agonies of earth? I shall take the first thousand million years in heaven to study out that problem; meanwhile and now, taking it as the tenderest, that Christ did come, that He came with spikes in His feet, came with thorns in His brow, came with spears in His heart, to save you and to save me. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." O Christ, whelm this audience with Thy compassion! Mow them down like summer grain with the harvesting sickle of Thy grace! Ride through to-day the conqueror, Thy garments smelling "of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces"!

Mightiest of all Facts

O sinner, fling everything else away and take Christ! Take Him now—not to-morrow. During the night following this very day, there may be an excitement in your dwelling, and a tremulous pouring out of drops from an unsteady and affrighted hand, and before to-morrow morning your chance may be gone.

STREET WORSHIP IN BOGOTA.

SOME of the difficulties attending the work of Christian missionaries in Bogota may be realized by the following statement, which the Rev. M. E. Caldwell sends to the Church: "There is nothing, perhaps, more annoying to Protestants in Bogota than the practice of carrying the 'Host,' or sacred wafer, through the streets. Suddenly you are surprised by hearing the tinkling of bells, and before you know, you have run into a procession carrying the 'Host,' and you presently find the people all around you taking off their hats, many falling on their knees, praying and showing every sign of the greatest reverence. If you stand looking on, without taking off your hat, you will be scowled at as a monster. It will not be strange if you are stoned or knocked down. You will notice in the procession a boy ringing a bell; then a bare-headed priest, dressed in his stately robes, comes walking under a broad red canopy or an umbrella, which an attendant holds over his head. After the priest comes a bare-headed rabble, and all persons within sight of the red canopy are expected to be on their knees, or at least to take off their hats. If you ask what all this means, you will be told that the priest is carrying the sacred wafer to some sick-bed, that the wafer is truly Christ our Lord, His body and blood, and that, therefore, you must worship the Host as it passes by. Sometimes Protestants are greatly annoyed by these processions, and are obliged to enter some house or store, or retrace their steps, to avoid insults or violence.

"Similar to this is the custom of striking the bell in the tower of the cathedral or the principal church of a town or city three times at morning mass, just at the time when the priest within the church elevates the Host. As far as the bell can be heard, the people take off their hats in the streets, and walk or ride bare-headed until the third tap of the bell dies away. They do not, however, cease from their business or conversation. If the great market-square in front of the church should be full of people, at the first sound of the bell off come the hats until the third stroke of the bell.

"When the archbishop walks out, wearing his costly robes, many of the people fall upon their knees and do reverence to the 'most holy father.' He is to the people their king and lord, and his word to them is law and gospel. In short, these poor people are taught to fear man more than God, and to bow down to images and perishable things rather than to worship in spirit and in truth the unseen Jehovah."

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back number if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New Youk.

City Missionaries, Christian Workers, and others may obtain miscellaneous back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mission, hospital, and prison work, and for general distribution, at $1 per 100. They will be found most valuable as tracts. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE PILGRIMS AT LOURDES.

An interesting description of the scenes at Lourdes, the famous shrine to which the French Roman Catholics go to be healed of their diseases, is given by a journalist who recently visited the place. To one who has witnessed Divine Healing in this country or Europe, it is suggestive of the thought that even the miracles of Moses before Pharaoh were imitated by the magicians with their enchantments. In the course of his letter the journalist says:

"The most interesting class of pilgrims are the humblest peasants who have hoarded up their savings for years perhaps, to come from distant Brittany, Normandy, Flanders, Burgundy, or the Alps. These poor people invariably undertake this long and weary railway trip in the heat and dust of summer, to ask the Virgin for some favor for their own homes, for some sick one who has stayed behind, or for the invalid they have brought on a mattress or in their own strong brawny arms. They only hope that they may be fortunate enough to be able some day to invest the remains of their savings in a small marble slab to record their gratitude for a miraculous cure or a prayer vouchsafed. How many, alas! depart year after year with heavy hearts and lighter purses, and with disappointment on their faces. Such is the faith of these French peasants that, even when thus disappointed, their features will be lit up with a proud satisfaction. Their voices will tremble with emotion when they naïvely relate to their neighbors the miracles that they were told had been accomplished during the very pilgrimage from which they, at least, came back empty-handed and disappointed.

"At Lourdes Station I saw some of the many invalids that are brought to the shrine in the hope that either a miraculous and sudden cure will be obtained by the intercession of the Virgin, or that some relief will be the result of ablutions in the water that issues from the rock close to the spot where Bernadette said that she had received the commands of Notre Dame de Lourdes, in 1858, to call upon the faithful to raise a church on the banks of the Gave. Most of the invalids seemed to be suffering from diseases that deprived them of the use of their legs. They had quite a number of Bath chairs and stretchers on wheels at the station, upon which the sick were laid and taken very comfortably to the carriages, and in some cases to their quarters. When the main body of the pilgrims arrive they bring with them so many invalids that the means of conveyance run short. An association composed of young men, and gentlemen even of the very highest classes, has therefore organized a sort of ambulance service. It is touching to see the sick and the cripples carefully tended and borne on stretchers by old and young men. The relatives of the sufferers who walk behind are profuse in their blessings and thanks for this kindness.

"The invalids are carried in the same way to the church and grotto, and there another association, composed of ladies and young girls of rank and fortune, tends to the wants of the invalids of their own sex. They are carried into the wooden sheds where the water of the famous fountain runs through large baths. The screaming and suffering creatures are lowered, often with great trouble, into the cold, clear water that sometimes has a salutary effect upon the disease or wound. The head of the ladies' association gravely assured me that she had witnessed marvellous results from this water cure, aided by the singular nervous excitement produced in the sufferers by their religious faith, and by the whole scene at this Mecca of Catholic pilgrimages. The priests and the associations for the relief of the pilgrims take care to have always some reliable medical assistance at hand. The physicians, who are all, of course, devout Catholics, now and then give certificates of duly authenticated and attested cures, and most of these documents are drawn up in cautious and guarded language. The inhabitants and clergy of Lourdes say that during almost every great pilgrimage, and always during the national pilgrimage in August, they witness some of these cases of faith and water cure."

A SUFFERER FROM HERNIA HEALED.

One of the most remarkable cases of Divine Healing on record is reported by Mrs. Baxter in this month's Thy Healer.* It is that of Mrs. Ward, of Southsea, England, who says: "I had suffered internally for over twenty years, when the Lord healed me. The internal injury prevented me walking scarcely any distance, and at last I was unable to walk even across my room. During that time I never knew what it was to live without medicine, or wearing a support. However, on December 18, two years ago, or some time before that, after reading The Christian Herald, I thought if the Lord could heal others He could heal me; and the Lord Himself showed me I was to trust in Him. I had no human help, and no one to teach me, but was led to trust Him fully. I had been given up by London and local physicians, and was brought near to death's door; so near, that they said mortification must set in, and it was only a matter of a few days. Then I wrote to Miss Sisson, and asked her prayers. After that, however, I became, if possible, much worse, but I still trusted the Lord; and after a long and severe trial of faith I recovered, and I am quite well, so that I can now walk miles, even in a hilly country. Since that time, three years ago next December, I have not taken any medicine, whereas previously it was impossible for me to go without it—it was to me just like my daily food. But the Lord led me to trust Him, and He has kept me without it, for I have not required it. Also, a month after I trusted the Lord with my body, He led me to give up the support I wore; and when the doctor next came, he was astonished to find the internal organs gone back to their right places. Formerly there was such a congestion of the internal parts that I could eat no solid food, and I was kept on Brand's essence; but now I can sit down and eat a hearty dinner.

A CENTENARIAN'S AWFUL REMINISCENCES

One of the most remarkable men in France is M. Chevreul, an eminent scientist who has just celebrated his one hundred and third birthday. His strength of body is astonishing at his years, and his mental vigor is not abated at all. His habits are very regular. He rises early and takes a plate of soup. He goes to bed again and sleeps till noon. He then has his breakfast, which consists of two eggs and some minced meat. This repast over, he drives out for two or three hours. On his return he reads scientific and literary works, following with interest the recent proceedings of various scientific bodied, and the accounts given of recent discoveries in many departments of science. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon he takes a bowl of milk with two biscuits. He lies down again for two hours, after which he has another plate of soup and goes to bed for the night.

M. Chevreul still vividly remembers some of the blood-stained episodes of the great Revolution, particularly the war in La Vendée. He was at Nantes during the Noyades and Fusillades ordered by the blood-thirsty Carrier, President of the Revolutionary Tribunal, who drowned, shot, or decapitated 15,000 persons, and was afterwards justly "guillotined." The guillotine used by Carrier stood before the house where M. Chevreul lived; and the centenarian himself relates that one day he was out near the place of execution when he saw two young ladies—friends of his family—brought up to the guillotine and decapitated. He was almost glued to the spot by the horrible sight, and his terror was increased tenfold when the executioner came up to him, seized him by the body and trailed one of his hands in the blood around the block, saying at the same time, "There! that's a good Republican baptism for you. It will make a fine sans-culotte of you, you young rascal!" Young Chevreul was two months ill after this event, and had he been of weaker mould he would have died with fright. M. Chevreul visited the Paris Sanitary Exhibition at the Palace of Industry, a few days ago; arm-in-arm with a friend, he mounted the stairs and walked through the Exhibition.

A CONVERTED CHINAMAN'S FAITH.

At a recent baptism in South China, the native pastor told a touching story of the steadfastness and unwavering faith of the husband of the woman he had just baptized. It appeared that several years ago he went to Australia, when he came under the influence of Christians, and gave himself to Chrfst. Not long since he returned with a small fortune, to settle in his native village. Troubles, however, beset him at once; his efforts at farming failed, and he lost much of his money; then a business in which he sunk the remainder failed, and he was left utterly destitute. Then, to add to his troubles, his child fell sick and died, and his wife became very ill. He seemed overwhelmed with troubles, bnt still his faith did not falter; his friends came about him, urging him to forsake his God, and attributing all his trials to the displeasure of the idols: they brought him incense-sticks, urging him to burn a few of them, but still he was firm, replying to all in the words of Job, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." He struggled on like this for some time, his wife only growing worse; then he and Mok, the catechist, agreed to meet together every day to pray for her, and ere long she began slowly to mend. Still, times went very hardly with them, and, in order to procure food enough, the man (Un Yung) journeyed to Canton, to try his fortune there, working as a coolie. He was not long there, however; for Mok, feeling how hard it was for the sick wife to be left alone, called him home, and asked him to become his cook. Here he gets perhaps five or six shillings a month, and his rice, but he is thankful even for this, and his other great mercy. His wife gradually recovered, and more than this, to the great joy of her husband his earnest words and the words of Mok reached her heart, and, by the power of the Holy Ghost, she has become a true believer. Since believing, she has been as active for Christ as she was previously in the service of the gods of the country, and has been paying visits to all the villages around, telling the women what God has done for her.

A PARALYTIC'S INFLUENCE.

The recently issued report of the Church Missionary Society describes the happy results of the influence of a paralyzed convert in India, one Pundit Mohan Lall Vidyabagish. Mr. Hall says: "The little room in our Christian compound, where he dwells, is filled from day to day with inquirers. There is a strange power of attraction about that couch on which he lies. His bright, happy face (a face never clouded, although suffering is no stranger to him), his telling words, chain men to his side, and those who are induced to visit him once, come again, and again, and again. Whatever may be the case with other Christians, all at least confess this, that this faith in Christ brings deep, abiding peace, and influences his life. Conviction is contagious, and not a few own to the truth of his words, yet fear to rank themselves, once and forever, upon the side of Christ."

A deep heart-work is going on, Mr. Hall believes, in high circles of society. One wealthy gentleman invited him to a sumptuous repast. He writes: "Lingering in the halls and corridors of the spacious house stood a number of Babus, each politely bowing as we passed; and I hoped inwardly that an opportunity to address them might be afforded before our departure. It came in a way least expected. 'Will you come below and pray?' said our host, when the meal was wellnigh ended. Ay, that I would, and I thanked God for the request. Descending the stairs and passing through numerous rooms, small and large, we entered the reception-hall, in which stood a large table and a number of empty chairs. One by one, members and friends of the household crept in and took their seats; and there, for an hour, I preached Christ to them. From the earliest prophecy, right through the ages, I tried to trace in the history of the Jews the purposes of God: His justice, His infinite love, His holiness and truth. Then in Christ's birth and life, and works and words, in His death and passion, His glorious resurrection and ascension, I showed how His purposes on behalf of poor ruined man were fulfilled. Then, while I knelt and prayed aloud, they bowed their heads in adoration, and worshipped. Since that day he has visited me several times a week, and I am convinced that he is a Christian."

THE PREDICTED REVIVAL OF DEMONISM IN THE LAST DAYS.

By Rev. H. W. Congdon.

A Judicial Punishment—Spiritualism a Mixture of Fraud and Ancient Sorcery—Prohibited in the Old Testament—Spirits in the New Testament—Their Malign Influence—An Infallible Test—Modern Spiritualism—Partly Fraud—Clairvoyance—Psychology—Wholly Unreliable—Opposed to Revelation—Immoral in its Tendencies—Must be Avoided.

By referring to II Thess. 2:11, it will be seen that the "strong delusion" of the last days will come as a judicial punishment because men "receive not the love of the truth." "Not liking to retain God in their knowledge, God gives them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient" (Rom. 1:28), and so they are taken captive at the will of Satan, in all his snares. A strong delusion certainly is the revival of demonism under the modern name of spiritualism. But all there is in it beyond mere fraud and trickery is as old as the Bible itself. It would be well for every one to give heed to the testimony of God's Word concerning it.

In the Old Testament

we find, in the first place, that all commerce between living men and the other world, whether beings of another order or the spirits of departed men, was prohibited under pain of death. See Exod. 22:18; Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut. 18:10–14. In addition to those who use the mysterious arts and divination, especial mention is made in these passages of those who "consult with familiar spirits"—demons, and of "necromancers," or those who deal with the dead.

In the next place, Old Testament examples of these sins may be seen in the case of Manasseh (II Kings 21:6; II Chron. 33:6); and in the case of Saul (I Sam. 28:8–21; I Chron. 10:13). From II Kings 23:24, we infer that this in the time of Israel's apostacy, and was one of the signs of the divine retribution soon to fall upon the nation. In all of these cases the displeasure of God was manifest; and the special judgments which He denounced, as well as the general penalty of death prescribed by the law, all show the estimate which God puts upon such dealings with spirits. And this estimate is still further seen in the prophets: Isa. 8:19; 19:3; Jer. 27:9; 29:8, 9; Micah 3:7; Zech. 10:2. It is evident that God regards with very great disapprobation this whole business of "seeking for the living to the dead," instead of seeking "to the law and to the testimony." There were very great reasons for all this severity. If men believe in Jehovah and love His commandments, they will govern their conduct by His law, instead of running after the "spirits." If being of such a mind as this, they want practical guidance in cases of doubt and perplexity, they will consult the oracles of the living God rather than seek mediums that "peep and mutter," and "whisper out of the dust." And it is only when people have lost their faith in God (at least in a large degree), regard His Revelation as insufficient, and the practical guidance of His providence and Spirit as unsafe, that they will turn away from Him to listen to Voices From Another World.

And as under the conditions of society in the times of the Old Testament, apostacy meant contamination with all the pollutions of the heathen, God ordained that all dealing with the other world, except through His own oracles, should be punished with death.

In the New Testament, the agency of spirits appears very frequently in the narrative, but generally as the possession of living persons by the unclean spirits of demons. The most casual reader of the Gospels and Acts will remark how numerous these cases are, and that Christ and His apostles recognized fully their demoniacal character. For examples see Matt. 12:22–28; Matt. 8:29; Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28; Acts 16:16. The nature of the request made by the demons of Gadara, is worthy of particular remark—they did not want to be sent into the abyss to be "tormented before the time." They understood that there is a day appointed in which God will judge both fallen spirits, and wicked men. (II Pet. 2:4.) They knew also that the place of their punishment is the abyss—in Hebrew Abaddon, in Greek Apoleia, in the Revelation of St. John, the Lake of Fire—and recognizing Jesus to be the Son of God and Judge of all, they were in terror lest He would consign them at once to this place of torment. Hence their entreaty. In I Tim. 4:4, we have that these malignant agencies will continue till the end of the present dispensation; and in I John 4:1–3, we have a test which, taken in connection with Isa. 8:20, will enable any one to decide infallibly whether a communication purporting to come from the other world has been sent by God, or proceeds from a fallen spirit. The Word of God will remain forever true, and Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is its Divine interpreter.

And now in this light derived from the Bible let us look at Modern Spiritualism.

We note the following facts concerning it: By its own acknowledgment it is necromancy and demononism. Its whole teaching is directly attributed to communications from spirits, either of dead men or beings of another order. It is thus directly within the prohibitions of the law forbidding intercourse with the spirit world.

It is inseparably mixed up with frauds and delusions. Many persons under its influence are entirely honest, without doubt; but it invites to its ranks all sorts of impostors, from the mere sleight-of-hand trickster to the adept in the mysteries of the black art. Its secret séance, its darkened room, its required attitude of expectancy on the part of the spectator—indeed, all the conditions of the "manifestation"—favor the imposition of fraud upon its innocent victims.

Another element of uncertainty in it is delusions produced by clairvoyance and mesmerism. Any one who has studied the subject knows that the human mind possesses certain capacities and undeveloped faculties, not in exercise in our normal condition, in the present state. When they do occasionally come into exercise, we catch glimpses of possibilities to be realized, probably in another state of life. Such is that power, exhibited in the mesmeric trance, of putting the mind into connection with things at a distance, or even into direct communication with the minds of other people, so as to be able to disclose matters entirely hidden from ordinary knowledge. This is called by the name of clairvoyance.

Similar to this is the power sometimes called by which one person may obtain such complete control over another person's mind as to make all its faculties subject to his dictation. In this condition the subject may experience delusions of mind and hallucinations of sense, and yet be utterly unable to discriminate between the true and the false, all being equally real to him. He will see things that never existed, and hear sounds that never vibrated in the air; or, if there is a slight foundation in fact for these pseudo-phenomena, it is so distorted and exaggerated as to be essentially false as presented to the mind of the confiding dupe. All this is simply mesmerism in one of its many forms.

Now, how much of this there may be in the phenomena of spiritualism at any given time, no one can know except those who work the mechanism of the séance. It is certain that the usual expectancy and as well as the conditions demanded for the "manifestation," favor the frequent intervention of mesmerism. In all this there is nothing supernatural; but it enables bad men to invoke these mysterious agencies, under the guise of the supernatural, to give credit to their vicious and pernicious teachings.

It is entirely unreliable. The spirits themselves are unseen and unknown, and can be judged of only by their own utterances. They come promiscuously—good, bad, and indifferent—and the hearer must judge between them. Now he listens to one who speaks against the Bible and the Christian religion; directly another comes along to tell him that the Bible is a good book, and the better he knows and practices what is in it the better for himself.

Besides this, the spirits often personate others. No one can be certain that the spirit communicating is the one he is alleged to be. When a living person comes to inquire of the spirit of a good dead man, it may be a departed relative—there is no assurance that the spirit responding is the one called for. It may be a wicked spirit or a demon, who is passing himself off in place of the one asked for. And if the facts of mesmerism and clairvoyance teach anything, they teach us that it is impossible for the medium to be so completely en rapport with the inquirer as to be able to obtain from his own mind all those facts which appear so supernatural when given in the communications. Now, amid all this uncertainty, the inquirer is thrown back entirely upon his own judgment to discriminate between the true and the false, the good and the bad. No candid spiritualist will deny the facts stated above concerning spirit communications; and on spiritualism is utterly unsafe and unreliable, either as a medium for finding the truth, or as a practical guide for the present life and the life to come.

In ancient times it was connected with the pollutions of the heathen. Its tendency in modern times is in the same direction. Its doctrine of "spiritual affinities" invades the sanctities of the domestic relations. It tends to a light estimation of the sanctity of marriage and the relations of the sexes; to induce people to enter upon such relations without the binding obligations of marriage itself; to easily lay aside these obligations when they have once actually been assumed; and finally to end in the communism of free love.

Such is spiritualism. It is a revival of the demonism of ancient times. It is a stupendous delusion, a snare of the devil. The only course for any one to take who would not be captured by it and led astray from eternal life, is to let it entirely, absolutely alone.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Postmaster-General Sent His Estimate for appropriations to the Secretary of the Treasury last week. This is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890. It is nearly six million dollars larger than the appropriation for the current year. One million is due to the extension of the free delivery system. The balance is made up of small sums incident to the opening of new offices. Mr. Dickinson allows, in his estimate for an expected increase of revenue, of $9,813,482 over the present year. He places it at $62 508,658. The apparent deficiency under these figures will be about $4,500,000.

A Welcome Pledge From the President-Elect is declared to have been given in an interview with a correspondent of the New York Herald. The rumor has been extensively circulated in the South, that General Harrison would nominate to Federal offices in that section, carpet-baggers and ignorant colored men; and Southerners understood only too well what that would mean. The correspondent states, in substance, that nothing is further from General Harrison's intention. He is anxious that every representative of the Federal Government in the South shall be a native, and of consideration and influence in the locality in which he will exercise his powers. As a further evidence of this intention the Herald quotes part of a letter from the President-elect to a gentleman in South Carolina, which concludes with the remark that "the policies in legislation advised by the Republican party, I believe are wholesome for the whole country, and if those who in their hearts believe with us upon these questions, would act with us, some other questions that give you local concern, would settle themselves." These words may well encourage our friends in the South to avoid the discomfort of indulging in gloomy apprehensions that may never be realized.

The Fifty-first Congress Will Have to Decide the question of the admission of several Territories, which are now preparing for pressing their claims. One important matter should not escape the attention of either the Territories or Congress. The strongest opposition to admission will come from the fear of Mormon power. Congress has had so much difficulty in dealing with polygamy in Utah, in spite of the advantages secured by territorial subordination, that it is little likely to raise to statehood any Territory promising to become a Mormon stronghold. Idaho has realized this, and has passed a law disfranchising the Mormons who control her southern counties; but the law was identical in principle with that which in Nevada has been declared unconstitutional. In Wyoming and Arizona there are large settlements of Mormons. In Wyoming four hundred Mormon families have settled in the last two ears. It will therefore be wise on the part of the Territories seeking admission, to provide beforehand effectual guarantees against Mormon supremacy, or Congress may be apprehensive.

The Necessity for Vigilance and Vigor in respect to the Anarchists, on the part of both legislative and executive departments of the Government, was proved by the evidence given at the trial of Hronek in Chicago on November 28. A detective produced thirty-four sticks of dynamite and eight bombs which were in Hronek's house, and an expert testified that the dynamite was of a more powerful kind than that used in legitimate business. Eight sticks of dynamite and a bomb were found in the house of a companion of Hronek. The police had tested one of the bombs out on the prairie, and it knocked to fragments a shed six feet high and six feet square. The chiefs of the Anarchist gang, it appears, are Bohemians, which fact should put the immigration commissioners on the alert. The general public has little idea how extensive is the extreme Socialist organization, and how desperate and reckless its members are. Unless effective measures to extirpate the evil are taken soon, our national freedom will be assailed by a conspiracy far more formidable than any that could be organized to bring the United States under monarchical government.

The Trouble in the Grand Army Which has developed in the West calls for the friendly offices of comrades in other sections. It will be a grievous misfortune if so valuable an organization should be divided by matters which are not within its province. The seat of the trouble is in Indiana, where the nucleus of a rival order was formed on November 28. It is to be distinctly political, and its leaders allege that they have been driven to its organization by the fact that the Grand Army in that and other States has become a political machine, with political principles opposed to their own. When the idea of the organization of the veterans in the Grand Army was first developed, it was with the purpose of keeping alive the spirit of comradeship and patriotism. As its members were drawn from the ranks of both political parties, the possibility that a majority, belonging to either party, might give a political character to the organization was foreseen, and it was decided that it should take no part whatever in politics. It may be hoped that if this wholesome rule has been infringed in Indiana and elsewhere, and cause given for organizing a rival association, comrades in other States will by friendly protests induce a reform of methods, and secure such a pledge as to the future as will recall the seceders to their old association.

The Federal Courts in Utah are Still Busy with the effort to suppress polygamy in the Territory. The Salt Lake Herald publishes the criminal calendar for the November term of court in the First District. The calendar contains fifty-nine cases, in which the defendants are held for violation of the Edmunds act. There are very few prosecutions for direct polygamy, because it is difficult to prove the polygamous marriage. In this list of fifty-nine no one is accused of having committed polygamy, but nearly all of the defendants are to be tried under that section of the act which defines and forbids "unlawful cohabitation." The names of a majority of the accused, indicate that they are immigrants from Norway or Sweden.

The Return of the Refugees from Jacksonville, Fla., who, it is stated, number twenty-three thousand, is prohibited for the present. The committee of the Board of Health has issued an address, warning them of the danger of a too early return, and enjoining patience. The committee say that the Federal Government has empowered Dr. Porter, the surgeon in charge of relief measures, to proceed with the purifying and cleansing process at the expense of the General Government, and he has since been actively, and with as much expedition as consistent with the attainment of the objects in view, perfecting the necessary arrangements. Infected houses and apartments are being opened during the present cold snap, and all means available are being used to prevent a recurrence of the plague. The committee do not ask those anxious to return to wait until the entire work is completed, but at least not to imperil their own lives and impede the work by the premature incoming of outside friends, or subjecting them to danger which may result fatally, and for which they should and will be held responsible, as the guardians of the public health. In conclusion the committee say: "It is impossible to state, as yet, just when we can admit the many who are anxiously waiting to come in, but we ask no long delay, and promise to work with hand and heart, night and day, to its early accomplishment; and we can give assurance that there will be imposed upon our absent friends and neighbors but a few days of delay in addition to that which ordinary prudence requires."

A German Expedition for the Relief of Emin Pacha is being rapidly organized. A committee has been formed, and at its meeting in the Lower House of the Landtag Herr von Bennigsen made an address, in which he pointed out that the interests of the German nation were involved in the East African troubles, and that the proposed expedition would materially conduce to the restoration of German prestige. It was unanimously decided to send Lieutenant Wissmann as soon as possible to lead the first column. Dr. Peters will in the meantime prepare to equip a supporting column, of which he will have the command. Lieutenant Wissmann will wait on the Emperor to resign his commission in the army, and to state his plans for the Emin relief expedition. He expects to be ready to leave Berlin about December 15. The fund subscribed for the expedition amounts to $80,000.

An Ominous Election in France Took Place on November 25. The Department of the Var chose as its representative in the Chamber of Deputies the notorious communist Gen. Cluseret. He was one of the leaders in the horrible days of 1870, when the communists held control of Paris. He was imprisoned afterward at Mazas, but escaped in November, 1871, after which he went to England, thence to this country, and lastly to Switzerland. August 30, 1872, he was sentenced to death, in contumaciam, by a Versailles court-martial. The general amnesty granted to the communists enabled him to return to France, where, for the past seven years, he has taken a leading part in radical politics. He is a man of considerable courage and dash, as he proved when, in his younger days, he fought under Fremont and McClellan in our civil war. His election is a significant sign of the trend of affairs in France. The present Government is stated, by well-informed persons in Paris, to be generally despised, and they believe that society is settling itself into the camp of General Boulanger as the only refuge from the dreaded communists.

The British Government Appears to Have failed to please the Irish party in the House of Commons by its plan of advancing $25,000,000 for the relief of Irish tenants. It is denounced as a plan for the relief of landlords, though it may inure to the benefit of the tenants ultimately. The correspondent of a prominent journal thus predicts the result of its operation: The working of this plan will be as follows: First, the Government will buy out the landlord at a figure much above the market value. Then the Government becomes the creditor of the tenant, who has 49 years in which to buy his land on the installment plan. Being his own landlord, the peasant will then have the privilege of paying taxes and dues of every description, including those now borne by the landowner, and which will be added to his yearly purchase money. When increasing hard times shall make it impossible for him to pay, the Government will find itself in the uncomfortable position of evicting the peasant. Several amendments have been proposed by Irish members, but they have been rejected by the House.

The Help Rendered to the Educated Indian by the ladies of the National Indian Association is more valuable than is generally known. At a recent meeting in the parlors of Mrs. William E. Dodge, of New York, Chaplain Frizzelle spoke from actual observation of its benefits. He said that the young Indians were too often sent back to their homes after receiving their education without a cent of money, and found themselves helplessly stranded for want of a little capital. He knew of cases where the Association, in advancing a little money for the purchase of a set of tools, or a horse, or a cow, or a small house, had set despairing graduates on their feet, and made industrious, saving men and women of them. In many cases these loans had been repaid, with interest.

A Deeply Interesting Description of Medical mission work in China was given to medical students in Association Hall, New York, on November 25, by Dr. Boudinet C. Atterbury, who has been laboring in Pekin. He said the medical missionary's first step, on entering a new field, was to open a small house and hang over the door the imposing sign, "Everybody's healing-place." At first none came. Then a few coolies took courage enough to venture within; and as they came out alive, and felt better, they soon gave a basis for securing the confidence of others. The Chinese, he said, were extremely superstitious and suspicious, and commonly believe that the medical missionary mixes with his medicine something which will induce them to believe in Christianity. This was one of the greatest annoyances they had to contend with. Another annoyance was, that the Chinaman did not like moderate treatment. He thought that if a small dose would cure a little of his pain, a big dose all at once would settle it. He first found this fact out by learning of a Chinaman who had saved up powders that had been given him from time to time, and taken them all at once. They nearly killed him. The opportunities for usefulness of a medical missionary in China, Dr. Atterbury said, were unlimited.

A Novel Experiment in Locomotion Was made in New York on November 27. Three cars containing sixty-five passengers started from the Fourteenth Street station of the Ninth Avenue Elevated road, and were drawn to Fiftieth Street and back at the rate of twenty miles an hour. The motor used was the new one invented by Mr. Daft, who operated it on the trip. Its power is gained from electricity. The engines generating the electricity were in Fifteenth Street, between Ninth and Tenth avenues. The circuit was completed by means of two wires, one of which connected with a copper rod running along the guard-rail. From this rod the motor gathered the electricity through an electric brush. A low, tension current was used. The motor weighed nine and one-half tons, about half as much as an ordinary Elevated railroad engine. The remarkable feature in the experiment is that there was no power in the motor that drew the train. Its capacity to move and draw its load was picked up as it went along, by contact with the wire by means of the patent brush. The Christian's progress in Divine life is analogous to this principle. The power is not in him, but comes from contact with his Lord, and without that he is powerless for the good of himself and others. (John 15: 5.)

The Ceremony of Hoisting the Stars and stripes from the flagstaff at the Battery, New York, was duly observed on November 25. It was the one hundred and fifth anniversary of the evacuation of the city by the only remaining British garrison in the United States. A company of veterans assembled around the flagstaff at a little before sunrise, to perform the usual commemorative ceremony of running up the national colors. Promptly as the sun rose above the horizon, the flag was run up, and amid the cheers of the assembled spectators, waved proudly in the breeze. A little later, however, the wind rose and soon began to blow a gale. It was too much for the flag, or it was thought to be so by those who had a fatherly interest in the flagstaff, so at noon the stars and stripes were hauled down. Happily for the country, the only significance in the lowering of the standard was the meteorological one suggested by prudence. It is sometimes otherwise, however, in our churches. Much to the regret of pastors and Christian workers, the human citadel from which it was hoped that the great enemy of souls was utterly and permanently ejected, and has hoisted the blood-stained banner of the Cross, lowers it before the storm of ridicule or social ostracism. In that case it is deplorable, because it signifies a return to the thraldom of its oppressor. (II Peter 2: 20, 22.)

A Restoration to Life by a Brother's Kiss is an occurrence described in an Indianapolis journal. It states that a lady residing in Jefferson County, Ohio, now visiting friends in Indianapolis, owes her life to the affection of a twin brother. Some years ago she fell on the threshold of her father's house, in what was supposed at first to be a fainting fit. A physician was summoned, who, after laboring for more than an hour to restore consciousness, pronounced her dead. Preparations were made for the funeral, but the interment was delayed to allow of the attendance of her twin brother, who was at college in a distant city. Though the body had been kept for several days, it was noticed that there were no signs of decomposition. When the brother came, he insisted that she was not dead. He threw himself on the unscious form, took the loved head on his arm, and kissed her passionately. As he did so the bandage around the head fell off, and as the mouth opened he declared that he saw a slight motion of the tongue. A physician was again sent for, and after a long time of alternate hope and despair, the girl struggled back to life. She said that during the five days in which she had lain awaiting burial, she had had moments of consciousness, but was powerless to move or speak. Her brother's touch and kiss were the first things that really aroused her from her trance-like condition. There are some, who have come out of spiritual death into newness of life, who give similar testimony. Not until they knew how Christ loved them, and died for them, did they awake to eternal life. (John 5: 25.)

An Urgent Plea for Mercy is Under the consideration of District-Attorney Burnet of Cincinnati. It has been presented by the friends of a bank president now under indictment for misappropriation of the funds of a National Bank. It is represented that the friends of the indicted man have made full restitution to the bank on his behalf, and that he is sincerely repentant, and has suffered great mental anguish on account of his offence. The District-Attorney, on consultation with Attorney-General Garland, received authority to act on his discretion. He went to the retired New England hamlet where the accused man is staying, awaiting his trial. He found him a hopeless physical wreck, borne down with shame and remorse, scarcely able to recognize his friends, and wholly unable to appear in court and make any defence. The District-Attorney did not announce any decision in the case, but from his sympathy and evident commiseration the unhappy man's friends believe that he will enter what is called a nolle prosequi plea, indicating that he is unwilling to press the charge. It is all that he can do. He cannot absolve the culprit, nor reinstate him in public esteem, and the man will still remain a criminal though spared from punishment. It is not so when the sinner goes to God for mercy through Christ. He not only escapes punishment, but his sins are blotted out and he is justified. (I Cor. 6: 11.)

A Temporary Recovery of Sight by an Aged blind lady in Pennsylvania is reported in the Philadelphia Record. It states that the wife of a farmer in Montgomery County, who is in her seventy-fifth year, has been totally blind for four years. The affliction caused a great depression of spirits, and the lady prayed earnestly, as her last wish on earth, that she might look once more on the faces of her children and grandchildren. Recently she suffered from a sudden attack of embolism, and for some time was in danger of death. After being four days in bed the crisis passed, and she sank into a refreshing sleep. When she awoke she found herself, to her intense surprise, able to see. She called her husband and begged him to send for the scattered members of the family immediately. He did so, and when they came the aged matron recognized each of them and greeted them affectionately. Neighbors hearing of the strange event, came too, and offered their congratulations. She was glad and thankful, but was not elated. She said that she knew the change was only the temporary one that she had prayed for. So it proved. After two days the light faded, her sight became indistinct, and finally she was again in total darkness. Happily, when the sufferer from spiritual blindness is, through faith and prayer, enabled to see the face of Jesus, and accept salvation through Him, the sight is not temporary, but lasts through eternity. (II Cor. 4: 6, 18.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. D. L. Moody is holding revival meetings at Portland, Ore.

The Rev. Dr. McCosh has promised to deliver a course of lectures to the students of Ohio Wesleyan University

Rev. Thomas Harrison's labors in Philadelphia are causing as remarkable a movement as they did in New York.

The Supreme Court upholds the law prohibiting the sale of liquors within one mile of the Soldiers' Home at Grand Rapids, Mich.

The Rev. Tan Khe, moderator of the Amory Presbytery, first heard of the gospel in the shop of a village barber who was a Christian.

A colored church society has been organized at Putnam, Conn. The pastor is Thomas Sunrise, a full-blooded Indian of the Oneida tribe.

An Iowa journal reports that since the passing of the Prohibition Amendment in that State the prison population has decreased from 725 to 537.

The Rev. Allan McKay has been commissioned by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions to take charge of the native church at Fort Wrangell, Alaska.

The Rev. Mr. Kendrick, of Columbus, Ohio, has been elected Missionary Bishop of the Episcopal Church over the jurisdiction of New Mexico and Arizona.

The new Episcopal church at Nice, which has been built principally by the contributions of Mrs. Niven, formerly of New York, is to be consecrated December 13.

Lewis E. Jackson, the energetic Secretary of the New York City Mission and Tract Society, is dead. Few persons outside the Society have any idea of the labor he was enabled to perform.

Of 81,176 arrests made by the police of New York City in 1887, 28,337 were for drunkenness, 4,708 for violation of the excise laws, and 25,638 for crimes attributable to the use of intoxicants.

The Rev. Dr. Willis Lord's death will be news of sadness in many homes in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and other cities in which his ministrations are gratefully remembered. He was eighty years of age.

A contemporary recommends the phonograph to the use of clergymen. It thinks that, if a clergyman could hear himself preach once in a while, he might notice faults that he would take pains to correct.

Mrs. H. Tudor, of Baltimore W. C. T. U., sends each week to the Maryland Prisoners' Aid Association 400 copies of a Gospel Letter, that are distributed in such a way that about 1,200 prisoners can read them. The chaplain speaks hopefully of the results.

The convention of Christian Workers at Detroit spent five days in earnest discussion of evangelistic methods, and in hearing suggestions from experienced evangelists. It is believed that the winter's work will prove much more aggressive as the result of the convention.

The Rev. E. P. Hammond's meetings for children, at Detroit, were much blessed. The evangelists at the convention assisted in the after-meetings, and over two hundred children professed conversion. Mr. Hammond is now holding children's services at Jackson, Mich.

Mr. W. K. Snider, the railway conductor evangelist, preached on a recent Sunday in the Methodist Church, Owen Sound, Canada, to a crowded house. Mr. Snider has become a noted personage, "who runs his trains all the week, and speaks three or four times each Sunday."

The National Sabbath Union of the United States will hold its first convention in Washington, D. C., December 11–13. The themes for discussion are: National Sabbath Reform; Sabbath Laws and Civil Liberty; The Sabbath of our Foreign Population; The Sabbath and the Labor Problem. For further information address the Secretary, Rev. J. H. Knowles, 71 Bible House, New York.

THE WORD A SWORD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing assunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." Heb. 4 : 12.

Different Interpretations of the Passage—Applies to Christ and the Bible—Men Who Separate the Two—I. The Qualities of the Word—A Quick or Living Word—Alive and Imparting Life—Powerful or Active—Tested by Personal Experience—By Its Power on Others—Cutting—Piercing—Discriminating—II. Lessons from the Qualities—The Book to be Reverenced—Get Life from It—And Power—And Discernment.

THOSE who are fond of a labyrinth of exposition will find a maze, perplexing to the last degree, if they will read the various commentators and expositors upon this verse. This is the question: By the Word of God, are we here to understand the Incarnate Word, the Divine Logos, who was in the beginning with God; or does the passage relate to this inspired Book, and to the Gospel, which is the kernel of it, as it is set forth in the preaching of the truth in the power of the Holy Ghost? It is a happy circumstance if we can see a way to agree with all those who did not themselves agree. But I have been greatly instructed by the mere fact that it should be difficult to know whether in this passage the Holy Ghost is speaking of the Christ of God, or the Book of God. This shows us a great truth, which we might not otherwise have so clearly noted. How much that can be said of the Lord Jesus may be also said of the inspired volume!

This I like to think of, because there are some nowadays who deny every doctrine of revelation, and yet, forsooth, they praise the Christ. The Teacher is spoken of in the most flattering style, and then His teaching is rejected, except so far as it may coincide with the philosophy of the moment. They talk about Jesus, while namely, His gospel, and His inspired Word, they cast away. I believe I do but correctly describe them when I say that, like Judas, they betray the Son of man with a kiss. They even go so far as to cry up the names of the doctrines, though they use them in a different sense, that they may deceive. They talk of loyalty to Christ, and reverence for the Sermon on the Mount; but they use vain words. I am charged with sowing suspicion. I do sow it, and desire to sow it. Too many Christian people are content to hear anything so long as it is put forth by a clever man, in a taking manner; I want them to try the spirits, whether they be of God, for many false prophets have gone into the world.

Christ and his Word must go together. What is true of the Christ is here predicated both of him and his Word. Behold, this day the everlasting gospel has Christ within it. It is only because Jesus is not dead that the Word becomes living and effectual, "and sharper than any two-edged sword"; for, if you leave Christ out of it, you have left out

Its Vitality and Power.

As I have told you that we will not have Christ without the Word, so neither will we have the Word without Christ. If you leave Christ out of Scripture, you have left out the essential truth which it is written to declare. Ay, if you leave out of it Christ as a Substitute, Christ in His death, you have left out of it all that is living and powerful.

Oh, it is a sad thing to have to stand in any house of prayer and listen to the preaching, and then have to cry, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him!" Rest assured that they have laid Him in a tomb. You may be quite certain of that. They have put Him away as a dead thing, and to them He is as good as dead. True believer, you may comfort your heart with this recollection, that He will rise again. He cannot be holden by the bonds of death in any sense; and though His own church should bury Him, and lay the huge lid of the most enormous sarcophagus of heresy upon Him, the Redeemer will rise again, and His truth with Him, and He and His Word will live and reign together for ever.

I. First let me speak concerning of God. It is "quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword." The Word of God is said to be "quick." I am sorry the translators have used that word, because it is apt to be mistaken as meaning speedy, and that is not the meaning at all; it means alive, or living. "Quick" is the old English word for alive, and so we read of the "quick and dead." The Word of God is alive. This is a living Book. This is a mystery which only living men, quickened by the Spirit of God, will fully comprehend. Take up any other book except the Bible, and there may be a measure of power in it, but there is not that indescribable vitality in it which breathes, and speaks, and pleads, and conquers in the case of this sacred volume. No other writing has within it a heavenly life whereby it works miracles, and imparts life to its reader.

It is a living and incorruptible seed. It moves, it stirs itself, it lives, it communes with living men as a living Word. Solomon saith concerning it, "When thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou awakest,

It Shall Talk With Thee."

Have you never known what that means? Why, the Book has wrestled with me; the Book has smitten me; the Book has comforted me; the Book has smiled on me; the Book has frowned on me; the Book has clasped my hand; the Book has warmed my heart. The Book weeps with me, and sings with me; it whispers to me, and it preaches to me; it maps my way, and holds up my goings; it was to me the Young Man's Best Companion, and it is still my Morning and Evening Chaplain. It is a live Book; all over alive; from its first chapter to its last word it is full of a strange, mystic vitality, which makes it have pre-eminence over every other writing for every living child of God.

See, my brothers, our words, our books, our spoken or our printed words by-and-by die out. How many books there are which nobody will ever read now because they are out of date! There are many books that I could read profitably when I was a youth, but they would teach me nothing now. There are also certain religious works which I could read with pleasure during the first ten years of my spiritual life; but I should never think of reading them now, any more than I should think of reading the "a-b ab," and the "b-a ba," of my childhood. Christian experience causes us to outgrow the works which were the class-books of our youth. "The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away: but the word of the Lord

Endureth Forever."

Its vitality is such as it can impart to its readers. Hence, you will often find, when you converse with revelation, that if you yourself are dead when you begin to read, it does not matter; you will be quickened as you peruse it. You need not bring life to the Scripture; you shall draw life from the Scripture. Oftentimes a single verse has made us start up, as Lazarus came forth at the call of the Lord Jesus. When our soul has been faint, and ready to die, a single word applied to the heart by the Spirit of God has aroused us; for it is a quickening as well as a living Word. Plants unknown in certain regions have suddenly sprung from the soil; the seeds have been wafted on the winds, carried by birds, or washed ashore by the waves of the sea. So vital are seeds that they live and grow wherever they are borne; and even after lying deep in the soil for centuries, when the upturning spade has brought them to the surface, they have germinated at once. Thus is it with the Word of God: it liveth and abideth for ever.

In our text the Word is said to be "powerful" or "active." Perhaps "energetic" is the best rendering, or, almost as well, "effectual." Holy Scripture is full of power and energy. Oh the majesty of the Word of God! Have you never noticed, when persons are converted, that they almost always attribute it to some text that was quoted in the sermon? It is God's Word, not our comment on God's Word, which saves souls. The Word of God is Powerful For All Sacred Ends.

How powerful it is to convince men of sin! We have seen the self-righteous turned inside out by the revealed truth of God. Nothing else could have brought home to them such unpleasant truth, and compelled them to see themselves as in a clear mirror, but the searching Word of God. How powerful it is for conversion! It comes on board a man, and without asking any leave from him, it just puts its hand on the helm, and turns him around in the opposite direction from that in which he was going before; and the man gladly yields to the irresistible force which influences his understanding and rules his will. The Word of God is that by which sin is slain, and grace is born in the heart. It is the light which brings life with it.

How active and energetic it is, when the soul is convinced of sin, in bringing it forth into gospel liberty! We have seen men shut up as in the devil's own dungeon, and we have tried to get them free. We have shaken the bars of iron, but we could not tear them out, so as to set the captives at liberty. But the Word of the Lord is a great breaker of bolts and bars. It not only casts down the strongholds of doubt, but it cuts off the head of Giant Despair. No cell or cellar in Doubting Castle can hold a soul in bondage when the Word of God, which is the master-key, is once put to its true use, and made to throw back bolts of despondency. It is living and energetic for encouragement and enlargement. O beloved, what a wonderful power the Gospel has to bring us comfort! It brought us to Christ at the first, and it still leads us to look to Christ till we grow like Him. God's children are not sanctified by legal methods, but by gracious ones. The Word of God, the Gospel of Christ, is exceedingly powerful in promoting sanctification, and bringing about that whole-hearted consecration which is both our duty and our privilege.

The Word of God, then, is quick and powerful in our own personal experience, and we shall find it to be so if we use it in laboring to bless our fellow-men. Dear brethren, if you seek to do good in this sad world, and want to work with, stick to the Gospel, the living Gospel, the old, old Gospel. There is a power in it sufficient to meet the sin and death of human nature. All the thoughts of men, use them as earnestly as you may, will be like tickling Leviathan with a straw. Nothing can get through the scales of this monster but the Word of God. This is a weapon made of sterner stuff than steel, and it will cut through coats of mail. Nothing can resist it. "Where the word of a king is, there is power." About the Gospel, when spoken with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, there is the same omnipotence as there was in the Word of God when in the beginning He spoke to the primeval darkness saying, "Let there be light," and there was light.

Next, the apostle tells us that this Word is cutting. "Cutting" would be as correct a translation as that of our own version: it is "more cutting than any two-edged sword." I suppose the apostle means by the description "two-edged" that it is all edge. A sword with two edges has no blunt side: it cuts both this way and that. The revelation of God given us in Holy Scripture is edge all over. It is alive in every part, and in every part keen to cut the conscience and wound the heart. Have you never heard of one who heard read, as the lesson for the Sabbath-day, that long chapter of names, where in it is written that each patriarch lived so many hundred years, "and he died"? Thus it ends the notice of the long life of Methuselah with "and he died." The repetition of the words, "and he died," woke the thoughtless hearer to a sense of his mortality, and led to his coming to the Saviour.

Anyhow, any bit of Holy writ is very nd many a man has been wounded by the criptures when he has been idly, or even pro- inely, reading them. Doubters have meant to reak the Word to pieces, and it has broken hem. Yea, fools have taken up portions, and tudied them, on purpose to ridicule them, and hey have been sobered and vanquished by that hich they repeated in sport. There was one who ent to hear Mr. Whitefield—a member of the Hell-fire Club," a desperate fellow. He stood p at the next meeting of his abominable asso- iates, and he delivered Mr. Whitefield's sermon ith wonderful accuracy, imitating his very one and manner. In the middle of his exhor- ation he converted himself, and came to a sud- en pause, sat down broken-hearted, and con- essed the power of the gospel. That club was issolved. That remarkable convert was Mr. horpe, of Bristol, whom God so greatly used fterwards in the salvation of others.

There is no sin-killer like the Word of God. Wherever it comes, it comes as a sword, and in- icts death upon evil. Sometimes when we are raying that we may feel e hardly know what we are praying for. I saw venerable brother the other day, and he said o me: "I remember speaking with you when ou were nineteen or twenty years of age, and never forgot what you said to me. I had been raying with you in the prayer-meeting that od would give us the Holy Ghost to the full, nd you said to me afterwards, 'My dear broth- r, do you know what you asked God for?' I nswered, 'Yes.' But you very solemnly said o me, 'The Holy Ghost is the Spirit of judg- ient and the Spirit of burning, and few are repared for the inward conflict which is meant y, these two words.'" My good old friend told ie that at the time he did not understand what meant, but thought me a singular youth. Ah!" said he, "I see it now, but it is only by painful experience that I have come to the full omprehension of it." Yes, when Christ comes, Ie comes not to send peace on the earth, but sword; and that sword begins at home, in our wn souls—killing, cutting, breaking in pieces.

But I want you to notice, next, that it has a rther quality: it is piercing. While it has an dge like a sword, it has also iercing even to the dividing asunder of soul nd spirit. The difficulty with some men's earts is to get at them. In fact, there is no piritually penetrating the heart of any natural an except by this piercing instrument, the Word of God. But the rapier of revelation will o through anything. Men may wrap them- elves up in prejudice, but this rapier can find ut the joints of their harness; they may re- olve not to believe, and may feel content in heir self-righteousness, but this piercing wea- on will find its way.

And next, the Word of God is said to be dis- riminating. It divides asunder soul and spirit. Nothing else could do that, for the division is ifficult. In a great many ways writers have ried to describe the difference between soul nd spirit; but I question whether they have ucceeded. No doubt it is very admirable to ay, "the soul is the life of the natural man, nd the spirit the life of the regenerate or spirit- al man." But it is one thing to define and uite another thing to divide. We will not at- empt to solve this metaphysical problem. God's Word comes in, and it shows man the difference etween that which is of the soul, and that hich is of the spirit; that which is of man, and hat which is of God; that which is of grace, nd that which is of nature.

Many times, I do not doubt, dear brothers, ou have found comfort in the discerning power f the Word. Unkind lips have found great ult with you; you have been trying to do hat you could for the Lord, and an enemy has andered you, and then it has been a delight to emember that the Master discerns your motive. Holy Scripture has made you sure of this by the way in which it understood and commended you. He discerns the true object of your heart. and never misinterprets you; and this has in- spired you with a firm resolve to be the faithful servant of so just a Lord. No slander will sur- vive the judgment-seat of Christ.

II. I have been all this while over the first part of the discourse. I have only a minute or two just to show one or two from the qualities of the Word of God that I have described. The first is this. Brothers and sisters, let us greatly reverence the Word of God. If it be all this, let us read it, study it, prize it, and make it the man of our right hand. And you that are not converted, I do pray you treat the Bible with a holy love and reverence, and read it with the view of finding Christ and His salvation in it. Augustine used to say that the Scriptures are the swaddling-bands of the child Christ Jesus; while you are unrolling the bands I trust you will meet with Him.

Next, dear friends, let us, whenever we feel ourselves dead, and especially in prayer, get close to the Word, for the Word of God is alive. I do not find that gracious men always pray alike. Who could? When you have nothing to say to God, let Him say something to you.

The Best Private Devotion

is half of searching Scripture, in which God speaks to us, and the other half of prayer and praise, in which we speak to God. When thou art dead, turn to that Word which still lives.

Next, whenever we feel weak in our duties, let us go to the Word of God, and the Christ in the Word, for power; and this will be the best of power. The power of our natural abilities, the power of our acquired knowledge, the power of our gathered experience, all these may be vanity, but the power which is in the Word will prove effectual. Get thou up from the cistern of thy failing strength to the fountain of omnipotence; for they that drink here, while the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall, shall run, and not be weary, and shall walk, and not faint.

Next, if you need as a minister, or a worker, anything that will cut your hearers to the heart, go to this Book for it. I say this because I have known preachers try to use very cutting words of their own. God save us from that! When our hearts grow hot, and our words are apt to be sharp as a razor, let us remember that the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. Let us not attempt to carry on Christ's War with the weapons of Satan. There is nothing so cutting as the Word of God. Keep to that. I believe also that one of the best ways of convincing men of error is, not so much to denounce the error, as to proclaim the truth more clearly. If a stick is very crooked, and you wish to prove that it is so, get a straight one, and quietly lay it down by its side, and when men look they will surely see the difference. The Word of God has a very keen edge about it, and all the cutting words you want you had better borrow therefrom.

Next, if we want to discriminate at any time between the soul and the spirit, and the joints and marrow, let us go to the Word of God for discrimination. We of God just now on several subjects. There is that matter of holiness, upon which one saith one thing, and another, another. Never mind what they all say; go to the Book, for this is the umpire on all questions. Amidst the controversies of the day about a thousand subjects, keep to this Book, and it will guide you unerringly.

And lastly, since this Book is meant to be a discerner or critic of the thoughts and intents of the heart, let the Book criticize us. When you have issued a new volume from the press—which you do every day, for every day is a new treatise from the press of life—take it to this great critic, and let the Word of God judge it. If the Word of God approves you, you are approved; if the Word of God disapproves you, you are disapproved. Have friends praised you? They may be your enemies in so doing. Have other observers abused you? They may be wrong or right—let the Book decide. A man of one Book—if that Book is the Bible—is a man, for he is a man of God. Cling you to the living Word, and let the gospel of your fathers, let the gospel of the martyrs, let the gospel of the Reformers, let the gospel of the blood-washed multitude before the throne of God, the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, be your gospel, and none but that, and it will save you and make you the means of saving others.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

DEGENERATE ROMAN SONS.*

When the son of Fulvius was found in the conspiracy of Catiline, the displeased father reprehended him sharply, saying, "I did not beget you for Catiline, but for your country." This is the language of God to His children: "I gave you not bodies and souls to serve sin with, but to serve Me with." Our bodies were not formed to be the instruments of unrighteous actions, nor our souls the gloomy abode of foul spirits. The Roman censors took such an utter dislike to the debauched son of Africanus, that they refused to let him wear a ring on which his father's likeness was engraven; alleging, "that he who was so unlike the father's person, was unworthy to wear the father's picture." Thus God will never grant any to enjoy the love of Christ in heaven, who are destitute of the likeness of Christ on earth.

A Present Rejected.

Pharmaces, the son of Mithridates, the King of Pontus, sending a crown to Cæsar at the time he was in rebellion against him, he refused the present, saying, "Let him first lay down his rebellion, and then I will receive his crown." There are many who set a crown of glory on the head of Christ by a good profession; and yet plait a crown of thorns upon His head by an evil conversation. By the words of our mouth we may affect to adore religion; but it is by the works of our lives that we adorn religion.

The Martyr Spirit.

It is reported of Hooper, the martyr, that when he was going to suffer, a certain person addressed him, saying, "O, sir, take care of yourself, for life is sweet and death is bitter." "Ah, I know that," replied he; "but the life to come is full of more sweetness than this mortal life; and the death to come is full of more bitterness than this uncommon death." A man may suffer without sinning, but he cannot sin without suffering. When Philip inquired of Demosthenes, whether he was afraid to lose his head, he answered, "No; for if I do lose it, the Athenians will bestow an immortal one upon me." He that loses a base life for Christ, shall hereafter find a better life in Christ.

A Persian Nobleman's Heroism.

It is reported of Hormisdas, a nobleman of Persia, who, being degraded of all his promotions because he would not change his profession, that afterward his persecutors restored them all again, and solicited him to deny Christ. But he rent his purple robe, and laid all his honors at the feet of the Emperor, saying, "If you restore me these honors with an intention to make me desert the Saviour, I beg leave to decline accepting them upon such conditions." Good man! he thought, and that justly, too, that Christ without worldly honor, was better than worldly honor without Christ. It is recorded concerning one of the martyrs, that when he was going to the stake, a nobleman besought him in a compassionate manner to take care of his soul. "So I will," he replied, "for I give my body to be burned, rather than have my soul defiled." How many professors are there who would rather have their sinful self satisfied than crucified!

philosopher, coming in at the same time, trampled upon it, saying, "I trample upon the pride of Plato." To whom Plato replied, "Yea, but with greater pride in Diogenes." They are fittest to find fault in whom there is no fault to be found. There is no removing blots from the paper by laying upon them a blurred finger. What do you get by throwing stones at your enemy's windows while you own children look out at the casements? He that blows into a heap of dust is in danger of putting out his own eyes.

Leanness and Victory.

It is said of the Lacedæmonians, who were a poor and homely people, that they offered lean sacrifices to their gods, and that the Athenians, who were a wealthy people, offered fat and costly sacrifices; and yet in their wars the former had always the mastery of the latter. Whereupon they went to the oracle to learn the reason why those should speed worst who gave most. The oracle returned this answer to them: "The Lacedæmonians were a people who gave their hearts to their gods; but the Athenians gave only gifts to their gods." Thus a heart without a gift is better than a gift without a heart. Religion is a sacrifice, but the heart is the altar upon which it must be offered. As the body is at the command of the head which rules it, so should the soul be at the command of God, who gives it. For a man to take his body to the service of God, and leave his soul behind him, is as if a person should send his garments stuffed with straw instead of making a personal appearance.

MRS. LEVI P. MORTON.

(See Portrait.)

Vice-President-Elect Morton, whose portrait appeared in this journal on July 26, soon after his nomination to the office to which he has now been elected, is said to be the most wealthy man who ever filled the Vice-Presidential chair. Popular rumor, which probably does not exaggerate in this case, places the amount of his fortune at twenty million dollars. He will, therefore, if he so desires, be able to entertain during his term on the most magnificent scale, and his wife, whose portrait we now give, is fully qualified to render those hospitalities as charming as they may be costly.

Mrs. Morton is a lady of dignified presence. She is above the average height, and is graceful of figure. Her countenance is pale, her features are finely formed, and her eyes, which are large and blue, are expressive of the amiability and refinement of her nature. But for her gray hair, Time has dealt kindly with Mrs. Morton. She is the mother of six children, of whom the only boy is dead. The eldest daughter is fourteen years old, and the youngest member of the Morton establishment is a baby. The family belong to the Protestant-Episcopal Church. Mrs. Morton's maiden name was Anna Livingstone Street, and she is a native of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where her father was a lawyer in practice, and where she was educated. Subsequently her family left Poughkeepsie and made their residence in New York, where Mr. Morton made her acquaintance, and had the good fortune to win her for his wife. Mrs. Morton has been quite a traveller, and is well-read and accomplished. Her musical gifts are said to be unusually developed for an amateur. Washington society is to be congratulated on the acquisition the election has given it at the expense of New York.

THE SOUTH DOME IN THE YOSEMITE.

(See Illustration.)

Below the Yosemite Falls, the most conspicuous objects in the landscape are the gigantic rocks to which the names of North and South Domes are given. The South Dome has so far defied all efforts of man to scale it. It rises almost perpendicularly from the plains, and appears to have been split by some convulsion of nature, leaving a sheer surface on one side, with not a foothold nor projecting ridge. The presence of enormous rock avalanches at the foot of the mountain supports this hypothesis, they evidently having remained to this day in the place where they fell. If the side of the mountain had been worn to its present condition by aqueous erosion or any other process, there would probably have been much smaller débris found at its base. The state of the rocks and bowlders which now lie between the Domes and the river Merced, also precludes the idea of their having been subject to the wearing operation of rushing torrents of water.

A recent visitor gives a vivid description of these and other mountains which are in the Yosemite region. He says: "The peculiar and unique feature of the valley seems to me to be the height and boldness of the cliffs, which spring out from the mountain-sides like sentinels to watch and ward over the secrets of the gorge. The brush of the painter, charged with the truest colors and guided by the finest hand and eye, could never do justice to these cliffs."

MARY HARCOURT'S REFUGE.

The snow was falling heavily, and the roads were heavy and soft. It was bad walking in the country districts, for the snow had filled up the tracks left by the wagons, and it was next to impossible to avoid stepping into them with a suddenness which was not unlikely to cause a fall. Mary Harcourt found this out as she tramped along, shielding her baby as well as she could from the cutting blasts of wind and the driving snow with her cloak.

Mary was going home. That thought was all which kept her moving. She pined for some shelter. At the city boarding-house where she had spent the last six months, she was told that the gentleman who had paid her bills up to three weeks before had not paid anything since. She had better look him up. Poor Mary tried to look him up, but failed. He had left the city, deserting the woman who had loved and trusted him to her shame. How she wished she had never seen him! How she wished herself back in the comfortable situation which her relations with him had caused her to lose! She had to face the hard-hearted boarding-house keeper, and tell her that she was going to look for employment, and to ask for patience with the bill.

"You cannot get employment, and, if you could, you could not attend to it with that baby on your hands," the woman had said. "I cannot afford to go on keeping you. I suppose I'll have to lose the three weeks' board, though it's a heavy loss to me; but I won't go on making bad worse. You must go."

Poor Mary felt the woman was right. It would be impossible to get employment. She must turn out, and it was winter too! Where could she go? A few friends she had in the days before her sin and her trouble, but there were none now to whom she could apply for help or shelter. The thought of suicide crossed her mind, as it has done the minds of so many others similarly circumstanced, but though her moral principles were sapped, and the dread of offending God, which in her girlhood would have preserved her from the temptation, was now gone, her natural timidity and shrinking from pain of any kind stood between her and self-destruction.

The thought of her widowed mother and the home of her childhood came up in her mind. Yes, that was the only hope. Her mother knew nothing of her trouble. Mary could not bring herself to write about it, and she had put the disagreeable duty off so long as she was cared

He had set self to convince a Christian woman, proud of her good name and unblemished character, that forgiveness and Christian charity are duties, no matter what the wrong-doing may have been. He failed miserably until he said, "Well, Mrs. Harcourt, let us pray about it." When they rose from their knees the old woman said, "Bring her back, sir; I see I was wrong. I'll be good to the poor creature, for the dear Lord's sake. God forgive me for my hardness: He has not been like that to me."

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

Early Days.

THE story which I propose to tell is a plain, unexaggerated record of facts which have come immediately under my notice, or which I have myself personally experienced. Much that to the reader may seem altogether incredible, would to a Mormon mind appear simply a matter of ordinary every-day occurrence, with which every one in Utah is supposed to be perfectly familiar. The reader must please remember that I am not telling—as so many writers have told in newspaper correspondence and sensational stories—the hasty and incorrect statements and opinions gleaned during a short visit to Salt Lake City, but my own experience—the story of a faith, strange, wild, and terrible it may be, but which was once so intimately enwoven with all my associations that it became a part of my very existence itself; and facts, the too true reality of which there are living witnesses by hundreds, and even thousands, who could attest if only they would.

I was born in the year 1829, in St. Heliers, Jersey. From my earliest recollection I was favorably disposed to religious influences, having been blessed with Christian parents, and surrounded by the sweet and holy influences of a Christian home, and when fourteen years of age I became a member of the Baptist Church, of which my father and mother were members.

My childhood passed away without the occurrence of any events which would be worthy of mention, although, of course, my mind was even then receiving that religious bias which afterwards led me to adopt the faith of the Latter-day Saints. Like most girls in their teens, I had a natural love of dress—a weakness, if such it be, of the sex generally. I was not extravagant, for that I could not be; but thirty years ago members of dissenting churches were more staid in their dress and demeanor, and were less of the world, I think, than they are to-day. In plainness of dress the Methodists and Baptists much resembled the Quakers.

My girlish weakness caused me to be the subject of many a reprimand from older church members, who were rather strict in their views. I mention these apparent trifles, not because I attach any importance to them in themselves, but because similar religious tendencies and similar weaknesses were almost universally found to be the causes which induced men and women to join the Mormon Church. From among Roman Catholics, who place unquestioning confidence in their priesthood, and also from among persons predisposed to infidelity, came few, if any, converts to Mormonism. But it was from the religiously inclined, the Evangelical Protestants of the Old World, that the greater number of proselytes came.

But to return to my story. I was one of the younger members of a large family; and when I thought of the future, I readily saw that if I desired a position in life I should have to make it for myself; and this I resolved to do, it being apparent to us all that our dear father, who had been an invalid for many years, was failing.

An English lady, the wife of a captain in the British army, to whom I had confided my aspirations, proposed, although I was not yet fifteen years of age—to take me with her to France, in the temporary capacity of governess to her children, assuring me, at the same time, that she would advance my interests in every possible way after our arrival. This lady and her husband were as kind to me as my own parents could have been; and soon after our arrival in France they procured for me a situation in one of the best schools in St. Brieux, called the Maison-Martin, where, young as I was, I engaged myself to teach the young ladies fancy needlework and embroidery, as well as to give lessons in English. Some of the elder girls, I soon found, were further advanced in fancy needlework and other matters than I was myself. This, of course, I did not tell them; but to supply my deficiency I spent many a midnight hour in study and in preparing myself to give the advanced instruction which would be required by my pupils on the following day. For some time after I began my work as teacher in that school, I spent the whole of my salary in paying for private lessons to keep me in advance of my pupils. It was for a while a severe task and a strain upon my youthful energies; but I have never since regretted it, as it gave an impulse to my mind that has remained with me through life.

I had not been more than six months in my situation, when the parents of one of the pupils objected to the school retaining a Protestant teacher, and I was consequently given to understand that unless I consented to be instructed, if nothing more, in the Roman Catholic faith, I could not remain in my present position. This was my first experience of that religious intolerance of which I afterwards saw so much. The principal of the establishment, however, being very kindly disposed towards me, advised me to submit, and it was finally agreed that I should be allowed twelve months for instruction and consideration.

During this probationary year I attended mass every morning from 7 to 8 o'clock, and was present at vespers at least three times a week Every Saturday morning I accompanied my pupils to the confessional, where I had to remain from 7 o'clock till noon; after which we returned to breakfast. On Sundays there was the usual morning mass, and after that high mass; and in the afternoon, from 2 to 4, we listened to a sermon. In addition to all these services, at which I was expected to "assist," a very interesting young priest was appointed to attend to the spiritual instruction of the young Protestant, as they called me, after school hours. He saw me frequently, but he was ill-qualified to instruct me in the Catholic faith or to remove my doubts, for he was not himself too happy in the sacerdotal robe. At first he aimed at convincing me that the apostolic priesthood vested in the fishermen of Galilee had descended in unbroken succession in the Church of Rome; but he seemed to me much more inclined for a flirtation than for argument; I thought I could at times discover something of regret on his own part at having taken holy orders, and in after years I heard that he had abandoned his ecclesiastical profession.

To the numerous stories of Catholic oppression and artifice in undermining Protestants and seducing them from their faith, I cannot add my own testimony. Those among whom I lived very naturally desired that I should be instructed in their religion, and join the Church to which they belonged; but their bearing towards me was ever kind and respectful; although when the twelve months of probation had expired. I found myself as much attached to the religion of my childhood as ever, and had in consequence to resign my situation. I had made many warm friends in the school, and none were kinder to me than the principal, who proved her attachment by finding for me a lucrative situation in a wealthy private family.

My new position was a decided advance in social life. The family consisted of husband and wife, two children, the husband's brother, and an elderly uncle. The little girls were, when I first knew them, of the ages of five and seven respectively. The young gentleman alluded to—the husband's brother—had been educated for the Church, but when the proper time came, had refused to take orders; the uncle was a fine old gentleman, a retired general in the French army, and a bachelor. Altogether they formed as happy a domestic circle as I had ever known. The position which I occupied among them was that of governess and English teacher to the two little girls.

My young charges during the first year made rapid progress, which was very gratifying to the family, and secured for me their good-will and interest. Had I been their nearest relative, I could not have received more respect and consideration from them. One member of the circle alone seemed to be entirely indifferent to my presence; this was the brother of Monsieur D. Though I had lived in the same honse a year, and had sat at the same table every day, scarcely a word had passed between us beyond a formal salutation.

The young gentleman was very handsome, and when conversing with others his manner was extremely fascinating. I did not believe that I particularly desired his attentions, but his indifference annoyed me—for I had never before been treated with such coldness, and I determined to become as frigid and formal as he could be himself. This formal acquaintanceship continued for two years, and I persuaded myself that I had become altogether indifferent to the presence of my icicle, while at the same time all the other members of the family increased iu their manifestations of attachment to me. However, several things occurred during the second year, which puzzled me not a little. Some unknown person availed himself of every opportunity on which presents could be made. I frequently found myself the recipient of anonymous gifts, chiefly flowers.

I naturally felt embarrassed by these delicate attentions, and determined to take Madame D. into my confidence. She, little thinking that the mysterious donor would prove to be her husband's brother, told me not to worry, because I was with friends who loved me.

In time the secret was solved; one little attention led to another, until at the end of three years I found myself the fiancé of the wealthy Constant D. Madame D. was opposed to my marriage with her brother-in-law, as she desired that he should marry one of her own wealthy cousins of the old noblesse of France. She treated me, notwithstanding, with great kindness, and confined her opposition to persuading me not to listen to her brother's suit; but finding opposition to his wishes ineffectual, she finally consented to our engagement, which took place in the following winter.

I loved the French people, and was pleased with their polite manners, but I was not French in character; and though the prospect before me of an alliance with a wealthy and noble family was certainly pleasant, and I was greatly attached to my fiancée, my mind was considerably agitated upon the subject of marriage, as it had before been occupied with religion.

During my sojourn in France I had frequently questioned myself whether I had not done wrong in remaining absent for so many years from my home and from communion with the church of my childhood, and I had always looked forward to the time when I should return to them again. To this occasional self-examination was now added another cause of anxiety, produced by the thought of marriage with a person of a different faith. Marriage, to me, was the all-important event in a woman's life, and some mysterious presentiment seemed to forewarn me that marriage in my life was to be more than an ordinary episode—though little did I then dream that it would have a polygamic shaping.

My young ambition alone had led me to France. I had aspired to an honorable social position, and had found both it and also devoted friends. Sometimes I felt that I could not relinquish what I had gained; at other times I yearned for the associations of my childhood, and the guiding-hand of earlier friends. The conflict in my mind was often painful. My early prejudices, and the teachings of those around me, induced me to believe that the Roman Catholic religion was entirely wrong; yet, notwithstanding, while living among Catholics I saw nothing to condemn in their personal lives, but much to the contrary. In fact, Romanism fascinated me, while it utteriy failed to convince my judgment.

While laboring under these most conflicting sentiments, I resolved to visit my native land, to consult with my parents about my contemplated marriage; and for that purpose I asked and obtained two months' vacation. During my residence in France, my parents had left St. Heliers, and had gone to Southampton, England. To visit them now, I had to take a sailing vessel from Portrieux to the Isle of Jersey, and thence I could take the steamer to Southampton. Monsieur and Madame D., together with the two little girls, accompanied me in their private carriage to Portrieux, a distance of forty miles, in order to confide me safely to the captain's care. As they wished me "bon voyage," and embraced me affectionately, Mons. D. handed me a valuable purse for pocket-money during my absence, and they all exhibited great anxiety for my welfare, saying over and over again au revoir, as they entered their carriage to return to their happy home—thereby implying that this was not a final adieu.

It was not necessary for me to stop in Jersey for more than a few hours, but I wanted to revisit the scenes of my childhood's happy days, and to speak again with those whom I had known and loved in early life. At St. Heliers I heard for the first time of the Latter-day Saints, or Mormons, as they were more familiarly called; but I cannot express how perfectly astonished I was when I learned that my father, mother, sisters, and one of my brothers had been converted to the new faith. It was my own brother-in-law who told me this. He himself, with my sister, were "Apostate" Mormons. They had been baptized into the Mormon Church, but became dissatisfied and abandoned it.

The St. Heliers branch of the Latter-day Saints had had a turbulent experience. Their first teachings had been a mixture of Bible texts about the last days, and arguments about the Millennium, the return of the Jews to Palestine, the Resurrection of the dead, and a new revelation, and a new prophet; but the improper conduct of some of the elders had disgusted the people with their doctrines, and the tales of wickedness which I heard were, if true, certainly sufficient to justify them in rejecting such instructors. The more I heard of this strange religion the more I was troubled; yet, as I knew my parents were devoted Christians, I could hardly believe that Mormonism was such a vile delusion and imposture as it had been represented to me, or they would never have accepted it; still it was possible that they had been led astray by the fascinations of a new religion.

In this state of mind I met in the street the wife of the Baptist minister. She greeted me affectionately, and then began at once to warn me against the Latter-day Saints. I inquired what she knew of them; and she replied that personally she knew nothing, but she believed them to be servants of the Evil One, adding, "There is a strange power with them that fascinates the people, and draws them into their meshes in spite of themselves. Let me entreat you not to go near them. Do not trust yourself at one of their meetings, or the delusion will take hold of you too."

"I cannot ignore Mormonism in this way," I said, "or pass it by with indifference; for my parents, whom I tenderly love, have been blinded by this delusion, and I can do no less than investigate its teachings thoroughly, and if I find it false, expose its errors, and, if possible, save my father's family from ruin." She was not convinced that this was the wisest course for me to pursue, but I resolved to attend a meeting of the Saints at once and judge for myself. My brother-in-law, when he heard of my intentions, tried to dissuade me, but, finding me determined, finally offered to escort me to the meeting-place.

What I heard on this occasion made a great impression on my mind, and set me thinking as I had never thought before. On returning to my sister's house she asked me what opinion I had now formed of the Latter-day Saints. I replied that I had not yet formed any conclusion, but that what I had heard had given me serious cause for reflection. "Oh," she said, "you have caught the Mormon fever, I see." I felt a disposition to resent this implication, but I was half afraid that, after all, my sister was right.

DEATH OF SAMSON.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for December 16. Jud. 16: 21-31. Golden Text, Job 33: 9.

Samson's Place Among Bible Characters—Angelic Directions for his Mother—Her Sensible Argument—The Spirit Adapting His Operations to the Child Nation—Samson's Infatuation—Contrary to the Law—His Parents Accessories—Development of the Hebrew Hercules—Lion-Slaying the Usual Beginning—The Strange Mixture of Physical Strength and Moral Weakness—A Judge Whose Own Life was Wrong—A Second Infatuation—His Fall and Self-Sacrifice.

THE life of Samson is a puzzle to many of God's children. That one so impure, so rebellious, should be mentioned among the men of faith in Hebrews 11, side by side with Abel, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, and Samuel, shocks many readers of the Bible. But let us not forget that Rahab the harlot has her place there too, not because God would tolerate sin, but because, as soon as she knew of the true God, she put faith in Him, and God reckons "according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." (II Cor. 8: 12.) "For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required: and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more." (Luke 12: 43.) Samson lived in a time when the law was not enforced: "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes." (Jud. 21: 25.) He was raised up by God as a scourge to the Philistines, not as an example to Israel, and the only thing God commends in him is his faith.

After the death of Jephthah—who was a preacher as well as a warrior, and a true man of God—"the children of in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years." God's children cannot sin without incurring the consequences: "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." (John 8: 34.) Most surely bondage and trouble follow the sins of God's children: He loves us too much to let the path of sin be an easy one. It is very touching to trace how, in the constantly recurring defection of the children of Israel, it was so frequently the Lord, and not the people, who first thought of deliverance.

"There was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah," and he was the father of Samson. Dan means judgment, and it is no accident that Samson came of this tribe. In his own life, judgment followed his sin; and in his life work he executed judgment upon the Philistines. His birth was singular. He was born of godly parents, of a barren mother, who was to act as a Nazarite for his sake, and he was to be a Nazarite from his birth. There is a sweet simplicity in the description of the angel's visit to Manoah's wife, announcing that she should have a son, and afterwards to her husband. Neither of them doubted the angel's word, and Manoah prayed the Lord for His direction as to how they should "order" the child that should be born. But the angel's answer left no direction concerning the child, but only concerning the mother. Does not God teach mothers that they need first of all to

and then He will deal with the children? Neither Manoah nor his wife knew that the messenger was an angel of the Lord until, when they had offered a kid with a meat offering, the angel ascended in the flame of the altar. Then Manoah was afraid, but his wife shewed her common sense when she stilled his fears, and said, "If the Lord were pleased to kill us, He would not have received a burnt offering and a meat offering at our hands; neither would He have shewed us all these things." God's word came to pass: "the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson, and the Lord blessed him." No doubt there was some real acquaintance with God which began in early life. "And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol." In the Old Testament, the Spirit of the Lord came upon men in a way which accorded with the light they had upon the mind of God. The Spirit of the Lord came upon Bezaleel "to devise curious works, in gold, and in silver, and in brass," &c., for the tabernacle. (Ex. 35: 30-34.) He came upon Moses for rule, upon Gideon and Jephthah for war (Jud. 6: 34; 11: 29), and upon Samson He came as strength. Probably his parents had great joy in him. As a child, there was promise of real piety, but as the strength of manhood developed, a strong self-will developed also. Oh, if he had possessed the obedience of his father with his own faith, what a glorious instrument he might have been! He was and was no doubt recognized as such. When he was a young man, he was attracted by a Philistine woman of Timnath. He did not conceal his affection from his parents; there was no attempt to deceive them, and although they objected to the match, Samson prevailed upon them to make overtures for him to her parents. His parents knew that this was directly against the command of God, and yet they lent themselves to do Samson's will! Samson's plea that he should marry this woman was no higher than this, "She pleaseth me well." Is this the motive of a man of God? "Christ pleased not himself." (Rom. 15: 3.) An unequal yoking, oh how it grieves God, and what misery it brings to hearts and homes! But Samson, although he was not a consecrated man, was God's chosen instrument to judge Israel, and all he did must have its effect for good or ill upon the people. God overrules what He cannot bless, and He did so in this instance. "He sought an occasion against the Philistines."

Like David, Samson's first manifestation of strength was in the slaying of a lion, when the Spirit of the Lord came upon him. He afterwards perceived, in passing by, that a swarm of bees had formed a honeycomb within the carcase, and he asked a riddle of the Philistines for a wager—"Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." They had found out his weak point, how this man who was so strong by faith in God, was weak in the point where he had sinned in marrying an unbeliver. It was his wife who worried out his secret, and gave the Philistines the advantage over him. This so stirred up his wrath that he slew thirty of them. But his domestic life must be a troubled one, his marriage, which could not be blest of God, was broken by man, and his wife given to another. This was God's message to him personally, and, at the same time, an incentive to revenge himself on God's enemies. He was thoroughly roused, and, single handed, he slew the Philistines "with a great slaughter," and there with the jaw bone of an ass he slew a thousand men. In every emergency he called on God, who worked a miracle for him when he was thirsty, cleaving a hollow place in the jaw bone of the ass, and giving him drink from it.

For twenty years Samson judged Israel, exercising faith in God for feats of strength against the Philistines, while at the same time his own life was wrong. He still was guilty of

and this led him to the terrible sin of fornication. He could not play with fire without being burnt. It is an unsafe thing to play with edge tools. His disregard of God in his affection, led at last to his ruin and death. He had set his heart on another woman, who proved a traitor to him. He loved with a selfish love, because it pleased him, and she turned out to be selfish too. A bribe of the Philistines proved too great a temptation to this unworthy woman, and she set herself to discover wherein his great strength lay. Thus the one he loved became his enemy, and almost his murderess. Delilah had her own way of enticing him to tell her wherein his great strength lay. There could have been nothing remarkable in the muscular development of the man, or it would have been manifest in his build. Samson's strength lay, not in him, but in God, and so long as his relation to God stood fast, he was stronger than other men. His answers to Delilah were but lies—Samson was not only an impure man, but a liar. Oh how far even a child of God can go in sin! Delilah had liers in wait ready to seize Samson when she bound him with green withes and then with new cords, and again wove, at his suggestion, the seven locks of his head with the web; but the same strength which had lifted the gates of Gaza from their hinges, and carried them to the top of a hill, broke the green withes "as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire," the new ropes were broken from his arms like a thread. The web which being woven, was torn away with the iron pin which held it to the beam, and all the liers in wait, with Delilah herself, were confounded. The wicked woman saw that the large fortune which was to make her a woman of property was receding from her grasp, and that soon Samson would surely be alive to her perfidy. She had no care for him, but she took him and said to him, "How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me?" Poor Samson! he had wronged God, he had sinned against his own soul; his sin made it easier for Delilah to sin too; he was near a fall; God was leaving him; Delilah was first, God was second. "He told her all his heart," and she saw at once that he had done so. His doom was sealed, but, like many a backslider, he went to sleep, and while he slept, that hair which had never been shaven, and which was the pledge of his Nazarite vow, was shorn off. He was rudely wakened out of his sleep by an alarm which had become familiar, "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson"; and he said, "I will go out as at other times before, and shake myself. And that the Lord was departed from him." Oh how often a backslider knows not that the Lord has left him! he preaches as before, but there is no unction; he prays as before, but there is no answer; others perceive, if he does not, that the Lord is not with him. The Philistines blinded and imprisoned Samson, and set him to grind corn like a woman. But tidings reached him that the Philistines were about to have a great feast, and offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god, because Samson their enemy was delivered into their hands, and Samson conceived a plan which they had not reckoned upon. Samson was sent forth from the prison to make them sport. The house in which the feast was held was crowded with three thousand Philistines, and all their chief dignitaries were there. Samson besought the Lord to strengthen him only once; his life had been one terrible mistake; while he had avenged himself on the Philistines, he had set the worst example of selfishness and sin; he had but one thing to give to God and to his country, and this he gave. Laying hold on the two middle pillars on which the house stood, he once more received strength of God, and "bowed himself with all his might." "Let me die with the Philistines" were his last words. He did die, but with him all the Philistines in that house, "so the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life." And thus it is when we give up ourselves, our self-life, then God's enemies are slain as never before; then His power does great things in a short time.

On his Weak Side,

THE ALTERED MOTTO.

Oh, the bitter shame and sorrow
That a time could ever be,
When I let the Saviour's pity
Plead in vain, and proudly answered:
"All of self, and none of Thee!"

But He found me. I beheld Him
Bleeding on the accursed tree,
Heard him pray: "Forgive them, Father:"
And my wistful heart said faintly:
"Some of self, and some of Thee!"

Day by day His tender mercy,
Healing, helping, full and free,
Sweet and strong, and, ah! so patient,
Brought me lower, while I whispered:
"Less of self, and more of Thee!"

Higher than the highest heavens,
Deeper than the deepest sea,
Lord, Thy love at last hath conquered:
Grant me now my soul's desire—
"None of self, and all of Thee!"

The RIGHT REV. BISHOP WHIPPLE, of Minnesota—FARIBAULT CATHEDRAL and INSTITUTIONS.

THE RT. REV. H. B. WHIPPLE,
Bishop of Minnesota.

A Bishop's Humorous Reproof—Bishop Whipple's Birth in 1822—Business and Political Life—Called to the Ministry—Unexpectedly Elected Bishop—His Election an Answer to Prayer—Arrival in His Diocese—A Dead Indian Baby—A Visit from Inquiring Indians—The Sioux Massacres—A Crisis Met by Prayer—A Quarter of a Century's Work—The Faribault Institutions.

A HUMOROUS retort, made not long ago by a bishop of some distinction among his episcopal brethren, was a tribute of no slight order to the earnestness and intense devotion of the character of the good and noble man whose portrait appears on the preceding page. The bishop in question was attending a convention, and, in the course of the various meetings which were held, he met Bishop Whipple several times in the corridors of the building. Bishop Whipple, absorbed in his own thoughts and the plans for the benefit of the redskins, whose interests are always the uppermost subject in his mind, passed his Right Reverend brother as if he had been a stranger. At last in one of these encounters the bishop laid hands on Bishop Whipple and good-humoredly took him to task for his lack of courtesy. Bishop Whipple, who would not willingly be discourteous to any man, was profuse in his apologies, and endeavored to remove from his friend's mind any wounded feeling there might be. "Ah!" retorted the Bishop with affected indignation, "If I had been an Indian, you would not have passed me without speaking." And that was true. Whatever lack of attention and cordiality the distinguished and the wealthy may have to complain of at Bishop Whipple's hands, no Indian however ignorant, poor, or degraded, ever failed to reach his heart, or to find a ready ear and hand for his story and his relief. The Bishop is, before all things, the friend of the Indian, the champion of his race and the unwavering advocate of his claims. It is a thankless office now, as it has been any time in the past history of our nation, but it may be said of the grand man who now fills it, as Christ said of the friends of the poor: He will be blessed, for they cannot recompense him; but he "shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."

Birth and Early Life.

Henry Benjamin Whipple is now sixty-six years of age, having been born at Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., on February 15, 1822. He is the son of John H. and Elizabeth Whipple; his mother's family name was Wager. Ill health prevented the future bishop entering college after being prepared, and he engaged in mercantile business in his native place, and was much interested in political affairs. God had, however, more important work for the young man than money-making or assisting in the election of candidates for political offices, and very soon the Holy Spirit signified to him that he was called of God to the ministry of the Church. He then studied Theology with the Rev. W. D. Wilson, D. D., now a Professor in Cornell University. He was ordained deacon in Trinity Church, Geneva, N. Y., August 17, 1849, and priest in Christ Church, Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., July 16, 1850, both orders being conferred by Bishop De Lancey. He became rector of Zion, Rome, N. Y., which position he held until 1857, when he removed to Chicago, and became rector of the Church of the Holy Communion in that city.

Mr. Whipple found in Chicago an abundance of hard work, and he settled down to it with the vigor and energy characteristic of the man. No man could have been more surprised than he, when, in the midst of his labors, word was brought to him that he had been of the new diocese of Minnesota. At first he did not see his way to accepting. Replying to the clergyman who informed him of his election, he said: "I cannot go. It is a mistake. I am not a scholar, theologian, or preacher. I am not even a graduate of college. I was trained up a merchant. I gave up my business to tell the story of the love of Jesus. I know that I can do that, and I can be a shepherd to the poor; but a bishop I can never be." There was, however, no mistake about the appointment; the election was made in due form, the choice of the clergy being fully confirmed by the laymen and there was also about the election a significance which specially appealed to the piety of such a man as Mr. Whipple. It appeared that the Convention was assembled in session in Chicago, vainly endeavoring to find a suitable man for the new and important diocese. At length, after many ballots, the great body knelt in silent prayer, being unable to agree upon any one. Mr. Whipple's name, scarcely mentioned before, was put in nomination, and he was unanimously chosen. He was consecrated in Richmond, Va., as first Bishop of Minnesota, and at once set out for his new field of labor, late in the fall of 1859, he being then thirty-seven years old.

Since his consecration his life has been one of self-sacrificing labor. Some idea of the

and the spirit in which he met them, may be gained from some facts recently given to the public by a writer in Harper's Weekly. That authority states that when the Bishop reached Minnesota there were 20,000 Indians in the State. Indian affairs were at their worst estate. The funds so liberally supplied by the Government, were stolen or wasted by the agents. The deadly fire-water flowed freely on all sides. Bad white men had dragged the Indians down to a depth of unparalleled sorrow and depravity. Disease and death held carnival in every village.

"I shall never forget," says the Bishop, "the awful sights which met my eyes at my first visit to the famous Gull Lake Agency. A dead Indian was lying by the roadside; a few miles from the agency I saw bruised and bleeding men suffering from the wounds received in a drunken fight. An Indian mother was scraping the inner bark of the pine-tree, to save her starving babes. The Sioux had suffered less than the Chippewas, but there were then the smouldering fires, which burst forth in the massacre of 1862."

Bishop Whipple says that no work has given him so much pleasure as that among the Indians. He is familiarly known as and the Indians know him as "Straight Tongue," or the "Father-who-don't-lie." Many whom he first met as painted savages are to-day civilized Christian men, leaders in business and Christian movements of all kinds. In Bishop Whipple's time he has appeared before Congress, before Presidents, and before the highest dignitaries of this and other countries, in the interest of, and to demand justice for, his beloved subjects. Large funds have been placed in his hands from time to time. He has been a member of Indian commissions, and in the pulpit, and through the press, he has fought for the rights of the red men. For over a quarter of a century he has been the most steadfast and persistent of the many people who have enlisted in this cause.

The Bishop's Field

of labor is but little known as yet, even to our own people. Speaking of some of his experiences in a recent sermon he said, "Every friend that I consulted said to me, as a young bishop that had schools to plant, and churches to found, and work to make the heart weary, 'Do not have anything to do with Indian Missions.' I looked up to my Saviour, and I made a vow that, God being my helper, I would never turn my back on the heathen at my door. I found that a visitation of our field required that I drive my horses 3,000 miles every year, and travel from 500 to 1,500 miles every year on foot or in a birch-bark canoe. I took my blanket with me and slept on the ground. The first day I came to an Indian village, I saw hung at the door of a wigwam a little bundle, and it was ornamented with bead-work so beautifully, that I turned to my guide and said, 'I would like to buy that:' and he whispered, 'Why, Bishop, that is a dead baby; it is the way the Indians show that a mother has lost her baby.' And then he said that when an Indian mother loses her baby, she wraps together everything that belonged to the baby, and makes a little bundle of it, and ornaments it with bead-work, and carries it wherever she goes, and, if she has anything very nice to eat, the baby's portion is always taken out, and no one of the family can touch it, but a wayfaring man may eat it, and, if not, it is given to the birds. 'Ah!' I said, 'an Indian mother's heart is like the white mother's heart.'"

A Suppliant.

"I sat one day," says the Bishop, "in the door of my study, and some Indians were coming up the road, and one of them knelt at my feet. I said: 'Do not kneel at my feet; I am a man.' He said: 'I do not kneel to worship you, but because my heart is so warm for the man that pitied my people. I live 400 miles from here. I knew that all the Indians to the east had perished. I never looked into the faces of my children that my heart was not sad. My fathers had told me there was a Great Spirit. I have often gone out into the woods and tried to talk to Him. One day, when I thought the sky was made of iron, an Indian came to my wigwam, and he said to me: "I heard a very wonderful story from that white man. He said the Great Spirit loves poor people, that His Son has come into the world, and he has told our people what He did, and how wicked men killed Him, and that he has gone into heaven, and now looks with an eye of pity on anybody in trouble." "I must hear that story," I said. I walked 100 miles to where I heard you were to be, and when I reached there they said you were ill and were going to die. I said, "The Great Spirit will not let him die until I hear the story." And then I asked for the nearest missionary, and I walked 100 miles. I have been with him three moons. I have got the glorious story all in my heart now; it is not dark any longer, but light, and is laughing for very gladness all the while.'"

The Bishop's memories of

of 1862 are of painful interest. He regards it as one of the saddest and darkest pages of our history, and had it not been for the civil war, would have attracted the attention of the civilized world, and taken its place in history by the massacre of Delhi, in India. In speaking of the massacre, he says: "The Sioux had been the friends of the white people in our section. For a quarter of a century they had not taken the life of a white man. The wretched Indian system was at its worst. It left red men without government or personal rights of property, and by its almshouse system, was training up savage paupers. In 1858 the Sioux sold us 800,000 acres of land on the north side of their reservation. They did not receive the moneys promised them. They waited four years, and all they received was a few thousand dollars' worth of goods. Meetings were held, and loud murmuring complaints were heard. The civil war was raging furiously, and the Indians began to think, from what they heard, that the South was victorious. The spark had been laid to the train of powder, and it was settled that the whites should be massacred. The terrible deeds followed in rapid succession, and in a short time the country was aroused. Many people were murdered at different points. Captain Marsh led a company against the Indians, was ambuscaded, and twenty-four were shot to death. The acts of heroism on the part of Christian Indians will forever live in the pages of history. Altogether, over 800 innocent people were butchered by the maddened savages, and only the most vigorous measures put an end to the great massacre."

How Bad News was Heard

in those dark days, the bishop recently told. He said: "The times grew worse. Many said, as of old, 'In the morning, Would God it were evening;' and 'in the evening, Would God it were morning.' Our schools and missions were crippled for lack of means. It is a miracle of God's goodness that we did not give up in despair. I only remember once that my heart failed me. One day I sat in my stu[illegible] Pa[illegible] unbidden tears stealing down my cheeks. One of our professors entered the door. I saw in his tell-tale face despair. I sprang to my feet and said, 'Don't tell me, brother; let us kneel in prayer.' We did pray; we arose; without one word, he threw his arms around my neck and kissed me, and went away. That was the nearest to failure in the history of Faribault."

A Quarter of a Century of work in the Diocese of Minnesota, dating from the arrival of the Bishop, represents a prodigious expenditure of labor. The writer of the article in Harper's Weekly, already quoted, thus briefly summarises it: "In the first twenty-five years of his work this good man preached and delivered 6,000 sermons and addresses, confirmned 9,263, baptized 708 infants and 308 adults, celebrated the Holy Communion 978 times, buried 80 persons, performed 72 marriages, ordained 86 deacons and 67 priests, travelled over 50,000 miles on horseback or by carriage, and told the Gospel story to more savages than any other man in the West, if not in the whole country."

The Faribault Institutions,

four of which are illustrated on the first page, formed another branch of the Bishop's work, distinct from that of his labors for the Indians, and demanded effort in itself sufficient alone to exhaust any ordinary man. Our author says that when Bishop Whipple first entered his diocese and fixed his residence at Faribault, the surrounding hills were covered with dense forests. There were no railroads or telegraph lines, the town a mere trading-post. He found in equal numbers the tepees of the Dakotas, the wigwams of the Winnebagoes, and the log-cabins of the first settlers, with a very few small basswood frames. There was not a brick or stone house in the place. What marvellous changes have taken place in a comparatively short space of time!

Shortly before the arrival of Bishop Whipple, the Rev. J. Lloyd Breck and the Rev. S. W. Manney had commenced educational work in the struggling village. The Bishop entered the work with tireless energy. Mr. Breck was the pioneer missionary, and his natural bent was work among the Indians. The new Bishop threw his very soul into his new work in the far Western wilderness. In 1862 the corner-stone was laid of a cathedral for the diocese. A large educational establishment—a hall named after the Rev. Dr. Seabury, first Bishop of the American Church—was begun the same year.

The Whipple Institutes

now include the Seabury Theological School, Shattuck Military Institute, and St. Mary's Hall. The Military School is magnificently equipped, and is named in honor of Dr. George C. Shattuck, of Boston, one of the most liberal benefactors of the Church work in Faribault. On the grounds is a memorial chapel which cost $30,000. It was built in 1872 by Mrs. J. G. Shumway, of Chicago, as a memorial to her daughter. Bishop Whipple met this lady while traveling in Spain, and she became greatly interested in his work. Several years after the death of her first husband she married a Mr. Huntington, of Boston. A few years ago, while traveling in the West, she fell from a coach, receiving injuries which caused her death. She left a bequest of $300,000 to Bishop Whipple—$100,000 to build a memorial hall at Shattuck, $100,000 to endow it, and $100,000 to build a memorial hall for the Seabury School. The first, Shumway Hall, has just been completed, and it is one of the finest school buildings in the West. Work on the second structure, to be called Johnson Hall, in honor of Mrs. Huntington's father, is now under way.

Seabury Divinity School is the theological school of the Episcopal Church. The building is in the mediæval style of architecture, and is very imposing. It is well equipped in every way. Many Indian missionaries have been graduated from it. St. Mary's School is a part of the educational work carried on by the Episcopal Church. It is a seminary of great repute, and occupies a large and very beautiful building. It was opened as a girls' school in the Bishop's own house in 1866, and in 1883 the present buildings were completed. These three institutes are incorporated as the Seabury Mission, and managed by a Board of Trustees. Large sums of money have been contributed from time to time by wealthy Eastern people who have become interested in Bishop Whipple's work.

While loving his own Church, Bishop Whipple has ever maintained a friendly attitude in relation to all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity and truth; and in his many religious and philanthropic works he has received valuable help from members of various evangelical communions. On the twenty-fifth anniversary of his episcopate the citizens of Faribault gave him a public ovation, and in other ways expressed their high esteem for him. Without respect of party, sect, or nationality, they acknowledged his excellence, and rehearsed his many good qualities.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Inscription on the Castle Window.—Mr. W. A. Campbell says: "It is told that on one of the windows of an old German castle, there are scratched with a diamond the following words: 'We live we know not how long. We die we know not when. We go we know not where. And yet we are happy!' How is it possible to be happy with the answers to these three questions still in doubt? But why should they be in doubt, when Christ has come to seek and to save us? And if we but trust Him we shall be able to say, 'He loved us, and gave Himself for us.' And, instead of looking forward to the end of this life as a great leap into the dark, we know we go to be for ever with the Lord."

A Centenarian's Procrastination.—"At 5 o'clock one morning, as I stood in my fisherman's boots and oil-skins, taking a look round me on North Shields pier, I noticed an old woman, and was surprised to notice with what nimbleness she was knitting, though she must, I knew, be very old indeed. Going over to her, I said, 'You appear very old, granny?' 'Yes,' she replied, with a smile, 'I shall be 105 years of age next birthday; and just a few weeks ago I buried my eldest daughter, seventy-five years of age.' 'You have, indeed, lived a long time; and I suppose it is needless to ask you now if you have trusted Christ?' The face that had formerly smiled so sweetly, and the tongue that had been so ready to give an account of her life, became changed in an instant. With a frown on her brow, she muttered, as she turned away, 'There is plenty of time for that yet!' The habit of procrastination had grown and strengthened so much upon that aged woman that she found it almost impossible to realize the pressing urgency of the truth that 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.'"

A Sinking Ship and a Drunken Captain.—An evangelist relates: "A friend of mine was on board a vessel crossing the Atlantic. They encountered a great storm, but managed to weather it all right themselves, and two days later they came upon a vessel which had not been so fortunate. It was evident she was sinking, in spite of all that the crew, who stuck manfully to the pumps, could do. Boats were lowered and rowed to the sinking ship, though the sea was still so high that it threatened to swamp the boats. When they got alongside, the sailors began to let themselves down from the ship into the boats. While they were thus engaged, the rescuers were surprised to see the captain of the sinking vessel interfere, and threaten to shoot any sailor who attempted to leave the ship. He was drunk to madness, and had been so ever since the ship had sprung a leak; and not content with making himself drunk, he had actually brought out liquor and offered it to the men, saying they would soon be dead, and they should enjoy themselves while they could. But, to their honor be it said, not one of them took advantage of the opportunity, but stuck to the pumps like men, until at the end of forty-eight hours' hard pumping, and when thoroughly exhausted, they were rescued, including the captain, who was forced into the boat, hugging his liquor case to him, without which he would not move. This proves how far drink will lead its victim. The captain, who should have been the first at duty and the last to leave it, should have cheered and encouraged his men, but he could not keep away from the drink. Drink robbed him of his manhood, and might have been the cause of losing his own life, and the lives of all entrusted to his care."

The Lamp in the Miner's Cap.—"I was driving along a country road near Wishaw, with a minister of that town, when I was surprised to see coming toward us a miner with his little lamp, which he carried in his cap, burning brightly. 'Why is that man carrying that light?' I asked my companion; 'if it were dark I could understand it.' But he could not tell me. By this time the miner had come nearer, and I recognized him as a Christian who had attended our meetings. 'Why have you got that light in your cap?' I shouted. 'I have no light there,' he said, putting up his hand and taking off his cap, and there, sure enough, was his lamp burning. 'Now,' he said, as he blew it out, 'I never knew it was there! I thought I had put it out before I left the mine.' And with a hearty 'God bless you!' we separated. 'Ah!' I thought, as I drove on, 'that illustrates how the children of God should walk in this world—with God's mark upon their forehead, bright and shining, but they themselves walking humbly, unconscious that they are 'letting their light so shine before men, that they may see their good works, and glorify their Father in heaven.'"

Found Dead on the Stairs.—Mr. McLauchlan remarks: "I remember a young man who once came to one of our meetings. I spoke to him about his soul, and urged upon him the necessity of accepting Christ, but he declined. He acknowledged he was a sinner, and that he must come to Christ some time or other, but not that night. He promised to be at the meeting the next night and settle it: but though some of us waited until it was late, hoping, praying, that he might come, he did not arrive. Next day a worker, who knew where the young man lived, called at his lodgings, and found him—dead! He had been a hard drinker, often staying out until early in the morning. The night before his death he had gone out, saying he was going to turn over a new leaf, and become a Christian. But he did not come near us. Next morning he was found lying on his own stairs, dead. He had gone home intoxicated, at a very late hour, and death had overtaken him. He had procrastinated when salvation was pressed upon him, and with what fearful result! With such cases before us, is it any wonder that we press upon you not to risk your salvation?"

Delivered From a Trap.—Mr. Dunn says: "A fellow-worker said to me not long ago, 'Oh, Mr. Dunn, I have had an awful temptation!' He had, before his conversion, been a very great drunkard, and through the agency of my wife, in our own sitting-room, had been brought to Christ. For eighteen months he had led a consistent Christian life, and now, when he had been attacked with this strong temptation, I was the first person to whom he came for comfort. As he was walking in the street the old thirst after strong drink had come upon him with increasing fury; he felt his strength of mind and his faith going, and it seemed as if he must enter the saloon which he was then passing; but just when all appeared lost, the man rallied, and looking up to heaven, gasped a prayer for help. At once strength came. The man was enabled to pass that trap of Satan, and was safe through the help so quickly sent. We bent our knees and thanked God for the temptation that He permitted, and in which His grace proved triumphant. We cannot help being tempted, but we can help falling under temptation. We cannot keep birds from alighting on our heads, but we can prevent them from building their nests there."

THE COMING OF THE KING'S WAGONS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday, December 9, 1888.

"And when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived, and Israel said, It is enough: Joseph, my son, is yet alive." Gen. 45 : 27, 28.

The Glories of the Egyptian Capital—Grandeur, Wealth, and Luxury—Joseph Second in the City—A Contrast with his Former Lot—Famous Men not Ashamed of their Origin—The Wagons Sent for Joseph's Humble Father—Jacob's Departure—Brought into a Palace—The King's Wagons to the Sin-stricken World—Bearing Food and Clothing—Bringing Good News—Joseph-Jesus Still Alive—The Wagons Returning—Bearing Souls to the Palace—The Presence of Jesus Makes Heaven—Reunion with Kindred—A Reminiscence of Boyhood—The Last Journey.

THE Egyptian capital was the focus of the world's wealth. In ships and barges, there had been brought to it from India frankincense and cinnamon and ivory and diamonds; from the North, marble and iron; from Syria, purple and silk; from Greece, some of the finest horses of the world, and some of the most brilliant chariots; and from all the earth that which could best please the eye, and charm the ear, and gratify the taste. There were temples aflame with red sandstone, entered by gateways that were guarded by pillars bewildering with hieroglyphics, and wound with brazen serpents, and adorned with winged creatures—their eyes and beaks and pinions glittering with precious stones. There were marble columns blooming into white flower-buds; there were stone pillars, at the top bursting into the shape of the lotus when in full bloom. Along the and fane and obelisk, there were princes who came in gorgeously upholstered palanquin, carried by servants in scarlet, or else were drawn by vehicles, the snow-white horses, golden-bitted, and six abreast, dashing at full run. There were fountains from stone-wreathed vases climbing the ladders of the light. You would hear a bolt shove, and a door of brass would open like a flash of the sun. The surrounding gardens were saturated with odors that mounted the terrace, and dripped from the arbors, and burned their incense in the Egyptian noon. On floors of mosaic the glories of Pharaoh were spelled out in letters of porphyry and beryl and flame. There were ornaments twisted from the wood of the tamarisk, embossed with silver breaking into foam. There were footstools made out of a single precious stone. There were beds fashioned out of a crouched lion in bronze. There were chairs spotted with the sleek hide of leopards. There were sofas footed with the claws of wild beasts, and armed with the beaks of birds. As you stand on the level beach of the sea on a summer-day, and look either way, and there are miles of breakers, white with the ocean foam, dashing shoreward; so it seemed as if the sea of the world's pomp and wealth in the Egyptian capital for miles and miles flung itself up into white breakers of marble temple, mausoleum, and obelisk.

This was the place where Joseph, the shepherd boy, was called to stand next to Pharaoh.

What a Contrast between this scene and his humble starting, and the pit into which his brothers threw him! Yet he was not forgetful of his early home; he was not ashamed of where he came from. The Bishop of Mentz, descended from a wheelwright, covered his house with spokes and hammers and wheels; and the King of Sicily, in honor of his father, who was a potter, refused to drink out of anything but an earthen vessel. So Joseph was not ashamed of his early surroundings, or of his old-time father, or of his brothers. When they came up from the famine-stricken land to get corn from the king's corn-crib, Joseph, instead of chiding them for the way they had maltreated and abused him, sent them back with wagons, which Pharaoh furnished, laden with corn; and old Jacob, the father, in the very same wagons was brought back, that Joseph, the son, might see him, and give him a comfortable home all the rest of his days.

Well, I hear the wagons, the king's wagons, rumbling down in front of the palace. On the outside of the palace, to see the wagons go off, stands Pharaoh in royal robes; and beside him, Prime Minister Joseph, with a chain of gold around his neck, and on his hand a ring, given by Pharaoh to him, so that any time he wanted to stamp the royal seal upon a document, he could do so. Wagon after wagon rolls on down from the palace, laden with corn and meat and changes of raiment, and everything that could help a famine-stricken people. One day I see seated in front of his house. He is possibly thinking of his absent boys (sons, however old they get, are never to a father any more than boys); and while he is seated there, he sees dust arising, and he hears wagons rumbling, and he wonders what is coming now, for the whole land had been smitten with the famine, and was in silence. But, after a while, the wagons have come near enough, and he sees his sons on the wagons, and before they come quite up they shout: "Joseph is yet alive!" The old man faints dead away. I do not wonder at it. The boys tell the story, how that the boy, the long-absent Joseph, has got to be the first man in the Egyptian palace. While they unload the wagons, the wan and wasted creatures in the neighborhood come up and ask for a handful of corn, and they are satisfied.

One day the wagons are brought up, for Jacob, the old father, is about to go to see Joseph in the Egyptian palace. You know it is not a very easy thing to transplant an old tree, and Jacob has hard work to get away from the place where he has lived so long. He bids and leaves his blessing with the neighbors, and then his sons steady him, while he, determined to help himself, gets into the wagon, stiff, old, and decrepit. Yonder they go, Jacob and his sons, and their wives, and their children, eighty-two in all, followed by herds and flocks, which the herdsmen drive along. They are going out from famine to luxuriance; they are going from a plain country home to the finest palace under the sun.

Joseph, the Prime Minister, gets into his chariot and drives down to meet the old man. Joseph's charioteer holds up the horses on the one side—the dust-covered wagons of the emigrants stop on the other. Joseph, instead of waiting for his father to come, leaps out of the chariot and jumps into the emigrants' wagon, throws his arms around the old man, and weeps aloud for past memories and present joy. The father, Jacob, can hardly think it is his boy. Why, the smooth brow of childhood has become a wrinkled brow—wrinkled with the cares of state, and the garb of the shepherd-boy has become a robe royally bedizened! But as the old man finds out it is actually Joseph, I see the thin lip quiver against the toothless gum as he cries out: "Now let me die, since I have seen thy face; behold, Joseph is yet alive." The wagons roll up in front of the palace. Help out the grandchildren, and take them in out of the hot Egyptian sun. Help old Jacob out of the wagon. Send word to Pharaoh that the old shepherd has come.

In the Royal Apartment

Pharaoh and Jacob meet—dignity and rusticity—the gracefulness of the court and the plain manners of the field. The king, wanting to make the old countryman at ease, and seeing how white his beard is, and how feeble his step, looks familiarly into his face, and says to the aged man: "How old art thou?" Give the old man a seat. Unload the wagons; drive out the cattle toward the pastures of Goshen. Let the slaves in scarlet kneel and wash the feet of the newly arrived, wiping them on the finest linen of the palace From vases of perfume let the newly arrived be sprinkled and refreshed; let minstrels come in with sandals of crimson, and thrum the harps, and clap the cymbals, and jingle the tambourines, while we sit down, at this great distance of time and space, and learn the lesson of the king's wagons.

My friends, we are in a world by sin famine-struck; but the King is in constant communication with us, His wagons coming and going perpetually; and in the rest of my discourse I will show you what the wagons bring and what they take back.

In the first place, like those that came from the Egyptian palace, now bring us corn and meat, and many changes of raiment. We are apt to think of the fields and the orchards as feeding us; but who makes the flax grow for the linen, and the wheat for the bread, and the wool on the sheep's back? Oh, I wish we could see, through every grain field, by every sheep-fold, under the trees of every orchard, the King's wagons. They drive up three times a day—morning, noon, and night. They bring furs from the Arctic, they bring fruits from the Tropic, they bring bread from the Temperate zone. The King looks out, and he says: "There are twelve hundred millions of people to be fed and clothed. So many pounds of meat, so many barrels of flour, so many yards of cloth and linen and flannel, so many hats, so many socks, so many shoes"; enough for all, save that we who are greedy get more shoes than belong to us, and others go barefooted.

None but a God could feed and clothe the world. None but a king's corn-crib could appease the world's famine. None but a king could tell how many wagons to send, and how heavily to load them, and when they are to start. They are coming over the frozen ground to-day. Do you not hear their rumbling? They will stop at noon at your table. Oh, if for a little while they should cease, hunger would come into the nations, as to Utica when Hamilcar besieged it, and as in Jerusalem when Vespasian surrounded it; and the nations would be hollow-eyed, and fall upon each other in universal cannibalism; and skeleton would drop upon skeleton; and there would be no one to bury the dead; and the earth would be a field of bleached skeletons; and the birds of prey would fall dead, flock after flock, without any carcases to devour; and the earth in silence would wheel around, one great black hearse! All life stopped because the King's wagons are stopped. Oh thank God for bread!

I remark again, that, like those that came from the Egyptian palace, the King's wagons

Bring us Good News.

Jacob had not heard from his boy for a great many years. He never thought of him but with a heart-ache. There was in Jacob's heart a room where lay the corpse of his unburied Joseph; and when the wagons came, the King's wagons, and told him that Joseph was yet alive, he faints dead away. Good news for Jacob! Good news for us! The King's wagons come down and tell us that our Joseph-Jesus is yet alive; that He has forgiven us because we threw him into the pit of suffering and the dungeon of shame. He has risen from thence to stand in a palace. The Bethlehem shepherds were awakened at midnight by the rattling of the wagons that brought the tidings. Our Joseph-Jesus sends us a message of pardon, of life, of heaven; corn for our hunger, raiment for our nakedness.

Joseph-Jesus is yet Alive!

I go to hunt up Jesus. I go to the village of Bethany, and say: "Where does Mary live?" They say: "Yonder Mary lives." I go in. I see where she sat in the sitting-room. I go out where Martha worked in the kitchen, but I find no Jesus. I go into Pilate's court-room, and I find the judges and the police and the prisoner's box, but no Jesus. I go into the Arimathean cemetery; but the door is gone, and the shroud is gone, and Jesus is gone. By faith I look up to the King's palace; and behold I have found him! Joseph-Jesus is still alive! Glorious religion, a religion made not out of death's heads, nd cross bones, and undertaker's screw-driver, ut one bounding with life and sympathy and gladness. Joseph is yet alive!

"I know that my Redeemer lives,
What comfort this sweet sentence gives!
He lives, He lives, who once was dead,
He lives, my ever-living Head!

"He lives to grant me daily breath,
He lives, and I shall conquer death.
He lives my mansion to prepare,
He lives to bring me safely there.

"He lives, all glory to His name;
He lives, my Jesus still the same,
Oh, the sweet joy this sentence gives,
I know that my Redeemer lives!"

The King's wagons will after a while unload, nd they will turn around, and they will go

nd I really think that you and I will go with hem. The King will not leave us in this famine-truck world. The King has ordered that we e lifted into the wagons, and that we go over nto Goshen, where there shall be pasturage or our largest flock of joy, and then we will drive up to the palace, where there are glories waiting us which will melt the snow of Egyp-ian marble into forgetfulness.

I think that the King's wagons will take us p to see our lost friends. Jacob's chief antici-ation was not seeing the Nile, nor of seeing he long colonnades of architectural beauty, nor f seeing the throne-room. There was a focus o all his journeyings, to all his anticipations; nd that was Joseph. Well, my friends, I do ot think heaven would be worth much if our rother Jesus was not there. If there were two eavens, the one with all the pomp and para-hernalia of an eternal monarchy, but no Christ, nd the other were a plain heaven, humbly hatched, with a few daisies in the yard, and Christ were there, I would say: "Let the King's agons take me up to the old farm-house."

If Jesus were not in heaven, there would be o music there; there would be but few people here: they would be off rying through the universe, "Where is Jesus? here is Jesus?" and after they had found Him, ith loving violence they would take Him and ear Him through the gates; and it would be he greatest day known in heaven within the emory of the oldest inhabitant. Jesus never ent off from heaven but once, and He was so adly treated on that excursion they will never et Him go again.

Oh, the joy of meeting our brother, Joseph-esus!—after we have talked about him for ten r fifty or seventy years, to talk with Him, and o clasp hands with the hero of the ages; not rouching as underlings in His presence, but s Jacob and Joseph hug each other. We will ant some new term by which to address Him. n earth we call Him Saviour, or Redeemer, or riend; but when we throw our arms around im in everlasting embrace, we will want some ew name of endearment. I can think of what e shall do through the long ages of eternity; ut what we shall do the first minute I cannot uess. In the first flash of His countenance, in he first rush of our emotions, what we shall do cannot imagine. Oh, the overwhelming glory f the first sixty seconds in heaven! Methinks e will just stand, and look and look and look.

The king's wagons took Jacob up to see his st boy, and so I really think that the King's agons will take us up ow long is it since Joseph went out of your ousehold? How many years is it now last hristmas, or the 14th of next month? It was dark night when he died, and a stormy day it as at the burial; and the clouds wept with ou, and the winds sighed for the dead. The ell at Greenwood's gate rang only a few mo-ents, but your heart has been tolling, tolling, ver since. You have been under a delusion, ke Jacob of old. You have thought that oseph was dead. You put his name first in the birth-record of the family Bible, and then you put it in the death-record of the family Bible, and you have been deceived. Joseph is yet alive. He is more alive than you are. Of all the sixteen thousand millions of children that statisticians say have gone into the future world, there is not one of them dead, and the King's wagons will take you up to see them. You often think how glad you will be to see them. Have you never thought, my brother, my sister,

How Glad They Will be to See You?

Jacob was no more glad to see Joseph than Joseph was to see Jacob. Every time the door in heaven opens, they look to see if it is you coming in. Joseph, once, standing in the palace, burst out crying when he thought of Jacob—afar off. And the heaven of your little ones will not be fairly begun until you get there. All the kindnesses shown them by immortals will not make them forget you. There they are, the radiant throngs that went out from your homes! I throw a kiss to the sweet darlings. They are all well now in the palace. The crippled child has a sound foot now. A little lame child says: "Ma, will I be lame in heaven?" "No, my darling, you won't be lame in heaven." A little sick child says: "Ma, will I be sick in heaven?" "No, my dear, you won't be sick in heaven?" A little blind child says: "Ma, will I be blind in heaven?" "No, my dear, you won't be blind in heaven." They are all well there.

In My Boyhood,

for some time we lived three miles from church, and on stormy days the children staid at home, but father and mother always went to church: that was a habit they had. On those stormy Sabbaths when we staid at home, the absence of our parents seemed very much protracted; for the roads were very bad, and they could not get on very fast. So we would go to the window at 12 o'clock to see if they were coming, and then we would go at half-past 12 to see if they were coming, and at a quarter to 1, and then at 1 o'clock. After a while, Mary, or David, or DeWitt would shout: "The wagon's coming!" and then we would see it winding out of the woods, and over the brook, and through the lane, and up in front of the old farm-house; and then we would rush out, leaving the doors wide open, with many things to tell them, asking them many questions. Well, my dear brethren, I think we are many of us in the King's wagons, and

We are on the Way Home.

The road is very bad, and we get on slowly; but after a while we will come winding out of the woods, and through the brook of death, and up in front of the old heavenly homestead; and our departed kindred, who have been waiting and watching for us, will rush out through the doors and over the lawn, crying: "The wagons are coming! the King's wagons are coming!" Hark! the bell of the City Hall strikes 12. Twelve o'clock on earth, and likewise it is high noon in heaven.

The Last Journey.

Does not the subject of to-day take the gloom out of the thoughts that would otherwise be struck through with midnight? We used to think that when we died we would have to go afoot, sagging down in the mire, and the hounds of terror might get after us, and if we got through into heaven at all, we would come in torn and wounded and bleeding. I remember how my teeth chattered and my knees knocked together when I heard anybody talk about death; but I have come to think that the grave will be the softest bed I ever slept in, and the bottom of my feet will not be wet with the passage of the Jordan. "Them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." I was reading of Robert Southey, who said he wished he could die far away from his friends—like a dog, crawling into a corner and dying unobserved. Those were his words. Be it ours to die on a couch surrounded by loved ones, so that they with us may hear the glad, sweet, jubilant announcement: "The King's wagons are coming!" Hark! I hear them now. Are they coming for you or me?

AN OPPOSER CONVERTED.

THE remarkable conversion of a young man so rabidly opposed to Christianity as to become an active member of an "Anti-Christ Society" is described in a letter from a missionary in Ceylon to the Missionary Herald. He says: "A remarkable convert was received into our Church on Sunday morning, the 15th instant, on profession of faith. This young man is a native of the island of Velany, belonging to a rigid heathen family, quite abstinent from flesh-eating. He was a leading member of the Anti-Christ Society formed some time ago for printing and circulating tracts against the Christian religion. One day in March last he, in company with some of his comrades, attended a meeting held at Nellore by the Rev. Mr. Grubb, one of the English Church missioners, with a view of disturbing the meeting by putting questions on some subjects. While at the meeting his attention was drawn to the general calmness and stillness of the whole congregation at the time of their worship, and the thought was strongly impressed on his mind that unless God were present there could not be such a scene of solemnity. He remembered at the same time the disorders and irregularities of their own assemblies, when the heathen come together for their religious worship. From that day he began to search after the truth of Christianity, and he is wonderfully convinced of its truth, and has now become a sincere and devoted Christian, in spite of all the entreaties of his friends, to their utter despair and disappointment. In consequence of his conversion, his parents have entirely forsaken him, and he is now in the industrial department of our Training Institution."

A JAPANESE FATHER'S THREATS.

IN a recent letter from Yokohama, Japan, to The Church, the Rev. H. Loomis says: "A young Christian from Kumamoto recently went to a distant mountain village to become a teacher in the local school. There was living in the same place a young man of about the same age, who had been adopted by the most wealthy person in that region. When he learned that the teacher was a Christian, he would not associate with him at all, and for a considerable time tried to make it as unpleasant for him as he could. But the teacher was not deterred from the path of duty, and in time won the confidence and esteem of the one who had hated and opposed him. Then a warm friendship sprang up between them, and the teacher was able to lead his friend to a belief in and acceptance of Christianity.

"When the father of the young man heard of what had happened, he threatened to disown and cast him out if he did not give up this new and hated religion; but these threats were of no avail, as the son said that the presence of Christ in his heart was of more value than either gold, houses, or lands.

"When the time came for the young man to be baptized, the father was present. Both returned to their home, and by neither word nor act was there any manifestation of opposition. On the contrary, the father seemed to be convinced of his former error, and allowed the son to do as he chose. This young man has been chosen to be the head-man of the village; and when he goes to the Christian services every Sabbath, he takes all his associates and officials with him."

A DELIVERANCE FROM DISEASE.

AN interesting testimony published in this month's Thy Healer, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, comes from Mrs. Brodie, who is well known in Christian circles in America. Speaking at Bethshan recently, she said: "I feel I ought to give a testimony to what the Lord has done for me. About February last I was taken very ill, and for three days suffered much with my lungs. I had serious symptoms, but the mention of them did not pass over my lips, excepting to my God. And when these symptoms appeared—as expectoration, blood-spitting, and night sweats, I thought the Lord wanted me home; and then came the sweet consciousness that He wanted me for Himself, and not for myself; and, though it seemed against my own will, He led me on still to trust in Him for perfect healing, with the result that I have had every one of these symptoms removed by the Lord, and He is my Life and my Love. I mention this, because there are some—and there may be some here—who do not give the Lord credit for being the Life of the body as well as of the soul. My husband, about three weeks ago, said I must be examined before the winter by a medical man, that as I had come from the tropics, he felt that for my own comfort, as well as those dependent on me in my home, I ought to be so examined. I therefore went to Doctor McKilliam, and he said: 'You have not a particle of disease, but you have traces of what you have passed through.' God, however, had delivered me from all disease.

"I have felt that the Lord has been teaching me a very deep lesson in permitting this sickness to come. When He first called me in British Honduras and brought me to Himself, He took away from me all fear of man in witnessing for Him, but the enemy made this sickness an occasion for a new temptation here in England, and the fear of man has come to be fear of refusing man when asked to engage in any Christian work; and so, all through this year, I have been under pressure, accepting invitations, because I did not like to refuse lest I seemed selfish, but God had been teaching me this lesson we have all to learn, that our life is not our own, but is sacredly given to Him."

A NIGHT IN GALILEE.

"I WAS travelling with a friend in Galilee," says a Christian lady, "and as we were riding along, tired and hungry, near the waters of Merom, we longed to find some place where we could rest, and get shelter for the night. There were no villages or houses near, where we might ask for a lodging, so we continued our journey until we came in sight of some black camel's-hair tents, which, we knew, belonged to the Bedouin. These people are very hospitable and kind to travellers, and after having eaten bread with a stranger, consider themselves bound to protect and care for him. So we rode up to the tent-door and asked for the sheik. He came out to welcome us, and sent for his wives to entertain us. Very soon we were surrounded by a crowd of dark figures; carpets were brought out, and we were seated in the middle of the ring of women. The first thing we did was to get some bread from our saddle-bags and invite the chief wife to eat with us. She took a small piece and liked it so much that she asked for more, and in a few minutes our little store of bread had quite disappeared.

"It was a strange, dark place, about thirty feet long, with no furniture but a few mats round the camel's-hair walls. A large wood fire was burning in the centre opposite the door, and our beds were put down behind it. An immense iron pot filled with rice was taken off the fire as we entered; we all sat round on the floor, and dipping our fingers into the unsavory mess, managed to eat a few mouthfuls. Then we talked to the group around of the goodness of our heavenly Father, who not only gives us temporal mercies, but loved us so much that He sent His beloved Son to die for us. The poor, ignorant women could hardly understand, and when we knelt down to pray seemed very much mystified. The sheik informed me that he could pray, and spreading a small carpet on the ground, bowed himself down on hands and knees, repeating over many times: 'There is no God but God, and Mahomet, the prophet of God.' He knew nothing about the God he prayed to, so, as he could read a little, I gave him a Testament, which I told him would teach him about God. Then we gathered the children together, and tried to make them learn a text.

"When all the men had left the tent, we lay down on the mats provided for us, and watched one after another of the tall, black-robed women disappear into the darkness in the corner of the tent. One only remained crouching with her long pipe over the smouldering embers, and every few minutes a man would glide softly in, light his pipe and go out again. Dogs and goats came in and out as they pleased, and evidently thought we had no business to be there from the suspicious way in which they snuffed around us. We lay, unable to sleep very much amid such strange surroundings. Early in the morning before anybody was awake, we crept out of the tent, called our muleteers, saddled our horses, and set off again on our journey to the Sea of Galilee, feeling quite rested after our night among the Bedouin."

INEFFECTUAL BEATING.

ONE of the China Inland Mission workers—Mr. Ballard—who has recently returned from his field of labor for a brief rest, says: "In Chou Siu, some time ago, there was a famine, occasioned by a scarcity of rain. Along with some others, I went and distributed meat to the starving people, and that kindness has borne much fruit in the drawing of the people to hear what we have to say to them about Christ. And now there are in that province from two to three hundred Christians. One of them was a keeper of the temple, who has a position somewhat analogous to the Levites of old. They get so much from the people, and have, besides, a small plot of their own; so, for that man to come to Christ, was to give up his sole means of support. He heard the gospel, accepted Christ, and resolved never again to worship idols. His conversion was soon noised abroad, and as one of the monthly religious festivals was approaching, he was commanded by the Mandarin to be in his place, and worship the gods as usual. He refused to obey this command, and the Mandarin, with the easy-going justice of the Chinese, said: 'Very well, I'll beat you.' He was beaten and sent away, and recommended to think over the matter again. A second time he refused to worship the idols, and a second time he was beaten, then turned out of his office. Now he is preaching Christ throughout the provinces with amazing success."

A FATAL CONFLICT.

A CANINE duel on a bridge was watched with interest on November 22 by a crowd of workmen. On each side of the long skeleton bridge which carries the track of the Greenwood Lake Railroad over the Passaic River, a dog has his home, and the two had a long-standing animosity between them. They were both powerful animals, and the men, who knew of the hatred existing, predicted that if ever they came into close quarters one, if not both, would be killed. On Thursday the two dogs stood at opposite ends of the bridge howling defiance at each other. After some time one of the dogs began to cross, stepping carefully on the ties. The other went to meet him, and they met just at the line where the movable part of the bridge separates on its swivel. As the dogs met and grappled the workmen were preparing to open the swinging draw. The bridge was drawing them apart, but the two brutes were biting viciously, and neither would let go his hold. They held together in their fierce struggle until the opposite corners of the bridge at the final point of contact swung apart, and the two savage creatures fell into the river below and were drowned. Even after they reached the water they could have swum ashore, but it was a duel to the death, and they went down, probably to fight as long as either breathed. Men, who ought to know better, sometimes allow their angry passions to gain so complete a control over them that they and their enemies are destroyed together. In the Christian life especially all anger is forbidden, and it is too often forgotten that its indulgence is an evidence of separation from God. (1 John 4: 20, 21.)

CHINESE AMUSING AN IDOL.

IN May of this year the Rev. A. D. Winchester, who is laboring at Pao-ting-fu, in China, was present at a remarkable religious festival, of which he sends the following description to the Missionary Herald:

The occasion was the annual visit of a god whose temple is outside the city, to a goddess whose temple is within the city walls. The festival lasts about three days. First, the god is amused by theatrical performances in front of his own temple. Theatres are built in front of the majority of temples for this purpose, and the most grotesque things are done to please him. Comedies and farces are ludicrously performed by the hired buffoonists, as though they were bound to make the god laugh.

The theatrical performance is followed by small offerings of various kinds, and the burning of large quantities of incense. Speedily the theatricals are resumed, and like the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, though they do not cut themselves and call, they play and call upon their god until completely exhausted and tired nature drops down, unable to make another sound or motion. On the third day is the great procession, when his godship is brought into the city temple. The procession lasted the whole day—from early morn until late in the afternoon. Innumerable bands of music (if the crashing roar produced by the utmost expenditure of physical strength in thumping huge gongs and clashing a multitude of discordant cymbals, the shrill scream of lutes, clarionets, whistles, &c., all in different keys, can be called music) were alternated by troops of players, acrobats, high-stilted pantomimists, knights in tournaments, jugglers, wrestlers, &c. The jugglers did really marvelous things. I have seen a good deal in my younger days, but nothing in acrobatic or juggling feats to compare with these. The remainder of the entertainment part of the procession was farcical and childish. The religious part, which comes last, is a most imposing and specious, but withal an utterably sad, spectacle.

The next scene, though more horrible and repulsive than the others, was, after all, only on a par with them. Thirty or more young men, from fifteen to forty years old, walk painfully slow and with measured tread, stopping at times for a few minutes to get their balance. Each one has his arms extended at right angles from his body, and propped up by a beautifully polished stick reaching from hand to hip. From the fleshy part of each lower arm was suspended, by an iron hook sunk in the flesh, a steel censer full of burning incense. It was a strange, a sad sight! For probably ten consecutive hours these intelligent-looking men bore that torture, with the hope that that would atone for some of their own or their relative's sins, or secure the favor of the god of medicine on behalf of some sick friend, or in fulfilment of a vow conditionally given on the restoration of some loved one to good health.

The day's proceedings were closed by an event more tragic than anything I have mentioned. In front of the temple where the god was visiting was dug a deep, wide pit, into which an immense amount of incense was thrown and fired. There the grand oblation of the day was offered. A poor wretch who was intensely anxious for the recovery of a near relative—some said it was his mother—in order to propitiate the god and save the life of that relative by giving his own, leaped into the flaming pit and was speedily consumed. Of course his "good and glorious deed" was applauded, and his tablet will be worshipped from henceforth by all his relatives. Though more noticeable, was this poor man's sad fate any more hopeless than that of the thousands who here daily cross death's sullen stream, possessed of a like false faith?

THE INVIOLABLE COVENANT.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.

THE very important question may be raised, Why does the 89th Psalm speak of David and his seed, and does not say a word of Abraham and his seed? Is Abraham not higher than David? We answer: Here we find a beautiful symmetrical unit, which is well worthy our attention. The Abrahamic covenant is the first and the highest, and comprehends all the lineal seed of Abraham, "the Jews." It might be called the Magna Charta of Israel's commonwealth. The covenant for David and his seed is of Israel, and included royal prerogatives, supremacy, and world dominion. The first belongs to all Israel, the last exclusively to the rulers of that people. If we desire to see a bright picture of the covenants of Israel blended and drawn into a focus, let us study Luke 2:21-32. There we see Jesus, our Lord, the Son of David, receiving the circumcision as the token of the Abrahamic covenant. Jesus' mother offering a sacrifice of "a pair of turtle doves," paying homage to the Mosaic covenant or law (Lev. 12:2) and then Jesus in the arms of Simeon, who spoke by the Holy Spirit, saying that that child should be "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel," is the acknowledgment of Israel's superiority and of the Davidic covenant. Mark particularly, first, the dispensation of the Gentiles (the present time, in which we are receiving light from Jesus our Lord); and second, after that, light should follow glory (which is above light), not principally to the nations, but to thy people Israel; the millennial era, and the personal reign of Jesus as the King of Israel in Jerusalem.

We ask your particular attention to those words, thy throne. "And says the Lord, and these words are not in the future tense—they speak of a completed work. It is something that David had already in possession; thy throne is an earthly throne. David never reigned in heaven, as the Apostle Peter teaches us (Acts 2:34), and as Paul reasons (Acts 13:34-37), and consequently "the sitting of our Lord Jesus Christ at the right hand of the Majesty on high" is quite different from thy throne, which is here mentioned. It cannot be said, that our Lord is building a house, is establishing a throne of David in heaven. The apostle in Hebrews 4:14 tells us "That Christ is the great High Priest"; (Heb. 8:2) "A minister of the sanctuary," and in verses 8-12 he speaks of "a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah" in the future time "after those days." We find the same distinction made in Rev. 2:21, and in Matt. 25:31: "To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne." "Then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory, and all nations shall be gathered before Him." Indeed, this is a subject of study, worthy of our attention.

The Time.

It is a sworn declaration (Heb. 6:16-18) made to David. "Even forever, I established thy seed and have built thy throne, to generation and generation." It means of ages and ages to come (II Sam. 7:25). Now the question arises: Was this promise, oath, and covenant ever fulfilled? We say, not in its whole extent. The rule of the Dynasty, or David's house, over the whole house of Israel, was not longer than eighty years. It was curtailed in power by the revolt of the ten tribes, and only for three hundred and eighty-seven years they were rulers over the house of Judah. Can four centuries be called forever? And now, for nearly two thousand five hundred years the Dynasty of David has not reigned over the Jews. The period of the Asmonean, or Maccabean rule, cannot be called David's Dynasty.

What a Hiatus!

What a period? David's house is set aside, not exterminated (Luke 2:2-4); and his royal descendants, the sons of David, are in the midst of us and may be seen in some of the poor, despised, scattered Jews, neglected by many of us Gentile believers. We have no doubt that many of them have a pedigree of royalty, far above that of the reigning Dynasties of Europe or Asia. Those sojourners among us must and will surely return to Canaan, the land of Jehovah, where the graves of the kings can be seen. The promise was made to Abraham and to David in that land of Canaan, and there they shall abide forevermore. (Ezekiel 39:25, 29.)

That covenant of Jehovah cannot be broken, curtailed, or abrogated. The promise is not made to depend on the perfect obedience of David's house, dynasty or sons; the very Psalm under consideration declares emphatically (vs. 31-37)—"If his children forsake my law . . . break my statutes . . . I change not . . . I lie not to David; his seed is forever, and his throne as the sun. As the witness in the cloud is steadfast."

The people of Israel will return to Canaan and so the crucified King of the Jews "will return from heaven (Acts, 1:2, Zech. 14:5) having received His kingdom" (Luke 10:12); will be seen in Jerusalem (Matt. 23:39); will be Priest upon his throne (Zech. 6:13); and this whole Psalm shall then be sung, as the glorious covenant Psalm of the Millennial period.

THE STUDY OF PROPHETIC DATES.

By the Late Canon Berks.

LET us examine the most usual and principal of the objections to the computation of prophetic dates in reference to the Second Advent of Christ, and we shall find them to be shadowy and vain; and that the duty of seeking insight into the seasons God has revealed, will only stand out in fuller and brighter relief.

1. We are often reminded that "secret things belong unto the Lord our God." (Deut. 29:29.) But when these words are perverted into an absolute prohibition to search into the prophecies, the rest of the verse supplies a conclusive answer. "The belong to us and our children." Surely every part of God's Word is a revelation. To number it among the secret things which are best honored by neglect, is really to fling back the Divine gift in the face of Him who bestows it. He declares solemnly that all inspired Scripture is profitable for us, and that whatever is written therein is written for our learning. Who are we, that we should pretend to be wiser than God, or profess that some of His revealed sayings would have been more wisely kept back from us? as if our neglect were to remedy the alleged unwise communications of the Spirit.

2. The words of our Lord to His apostles have given rise to another scruple: "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power. (Acts 1:7.) These, however, when searched, are a

into the times and seasons of prophecy. The words are not general, as our version seems to imply, but special. "It is not for you to know the times and seasons which the Father hath reserved in His own power." There is here a direct allusion to a text familiar to the apostles, and which explains the true meaning of the answer. Daniel (chapter 12) had heard two angels put the inquiry, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" The Son of God replied, with a solemn oath, that "It shall be for a time and times and half a time, and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." The prophet then asks for further light, but receives the answer, "The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end."

The answer, then, of our Lord to His apostles on earth is only the echo of His reply to the prophet in the vision. The event spoken of is clearly the same in both, "the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, and the end of the scattering of the holy people."

The "Times" of Delay

before that event were sealed till the time of the end; until then the Father, by the lips of the covenant angel, had expressly reserved them in His own power. The disciples asked the time of that restoration. Our Lord, as if pointing them to the words of Daniel, introduces the very term employed in the vision, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power." As if He had said, The "period of which you speak follows certain times of predicted delay; and these times and seasons have been reserved at present from a complete revelation, until the Father Himself, at the time of the end, shall begin to unseal them."

We have thus a fourfold answer to this objection from Acts 1.7. First, the words are not general as to all times, but refer specially to the three times and a half which were to be sealed and closed until a later period. Secondly, they are not general as to Christians in all ages, but relate, with a marked emphasis, to the apostles themselves, and Christians in their day. "Such knowledge," our Lord implies, "may be hereafter given to others, but it is not for you. Another work is assigned you, to found the Church and spread the gospel through the world." It is only when faith begins to decay that of that blessed hope, which will be as life from the dead to the unbelieving world. And hence, thirdly, they are a secret assurance that there will be other Christians of a later age to whom these times will be unsealed, as the seventy years of Jeremiah were to Daniel himself, shortly before their close. (Dan. 9:2.) Fourthly, there were other times not reserved which the apostles themselves might know, as the fall of Jerusalem and of the Temple in their own generation from the prophecy in Matt. 24:34.

3. But this leads us to the words of Christ in the prophecy on the mount, which are often viewed as a clear censure on all prophetic inquiries: "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father" (Mark 13:32.) How far the spirit of this caution extends may require much spiritual wisdom to determine; but conclusions loosely and rashly drawn from it have nothing to sustain them. First, the assertion is strictly true only of the time when our Saviour spoke those words:—for, surely, with regard to the Son of God, they must have ceased to be true when He was risen and ascended into glory. Our Lord Himself, since they were uttered, has received in His human nature immeasurable wisdom; and we may infer that His Church also, though in measures infinitely short of His own, will receive from age to age an increase of knowledge. "At the time of the End many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." (Daniel 12:2.)

To ascertain our true place in the decrees of Providence, and the prophetic features of the generation in which we live; nay, even to make computations with caution, on the year when revealed numbers may expire, are justified by the examples of Scripture, and encouraged and commended by the Spirit of God.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message to Congress on its reassembling on December 3 takes a somewhat sombre view of the future, while admitting the present general prosperity of the nation. Mr. Cleveland is apprehensive that we are menaced with danger from the fact that the poorer classes of our people have just cause of complaint of past legislation. He believes that the policy of Congress has operated so completely in the interest of wealth and capital, that the poor have had little opportunity to rise out of their poverty, and that their opportunities are continually growing smaller. He said: "The existing situation is injurious to the health of our entire body politic. It stifles, in those for whose benefit it is permitted, all patriotic love of country, and substitutes in its place selfish greed and grasping avarice. Devotion to American citizenship for its own sake, and for what it should accomplish as a motive to our nation's advancement, and the happiness of all our people, is displaced by the assumption that the Government, instead of being the embodiment of equality, is but an instrumentality through which especial and individual advantages are to be gained. . . . . Communism is a hateful thing, and a menace to peace and organized government. But the communism of combined wealth and capital, the outgrowth of overweening cupidity and selfishness, which insidiously undermines the justice and integrity of free institutions, is not less dangerous than the communism of oppressed poverty and toil, which, exasperated by injustice and discontent, attacks with wild disorder the citadel of rule." The President probably does not anticipate that there ever will be communism among the wealthy—there is little prospect of that—but that the combination of the wealthy constituted as great a danger to the nation as communism would among the poor.

The Canadian Fishery Question is the Only important foreign topic discussed by the President in his message. On this he says: "Having essayed, in the discharge of my duty, to procure by negotiation the settlement of a long-standing cause of dispute, and to remove a constant menace to the good relations of the two countries, and continuing to be of opinion that the treaty of February last, which failed to receive the approval of the Senate, did supply 'a satisfactory, practical, and final adjustment, upon a basis honorable and just to both parties of the difficult and vexed question to which it related,' and having subsequently and unavailingly recommended other legislation to Congress, which I hoped would suffice to meet the exigency created by the rejection of the treaty, I now again invoke the earnest and immediate attention of the Congress to the condition of this important question as it now stands before them and the country, and for the settlement of which I am deeply solicitous." A brief defence of his conduct in the Sackville incident, of a not very happy or dignified character, is given by the President, but it will not tend to allay the feeling which that incident aroused.

Dealing With the Details of Administrative operations, the President states that the total sum expended for pensions and administration of the office is over $82,000,000, and forms, he says, twenty-one and one half per cent. of the gross income, and nearly thirty-one per cent. of the total expenditures of the Government. 452,557 persons are now receiving pensions, of whom 806 are of the War of 1812, with 10,787 widows of those who served in that war. Sixteen hundred and sixty pensioners served in the Mexican War, and 5,104 are widows of those who served in that war. The army consists of 2,189 officers and 24,549 enlisted men, and costs $32,000,000. Eleven effective vessels will be added to the navy within the next twelve months, and the ordinary expenses of the Navy Department have been decreased by more than twenty per cent. from the sum expended for the same purposes in the years 1882 and 1884.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the taxes actually collected during the fiscal year ending last June amounted to $379,250,000, and the actual necessary expenses, including $80,000,000 for pensions, were $259,000,000, leaving a surplus of unnecessary taxation of $119,750,000. Of this $46,500,000 was used for the already overpaid sinking fund, and the debt was redeemed and bonds bought with all the rest except $36,500,000. He had a new proposal to make on the subject of the coinage of silver dollars, which has been continued under the mandatory regulation of Congress, until the Government is embarrassed by the accumulation. Mr. Fairchild now suggests that silver purchases shall be temporarily stopped whenever the Treasury owns five millions more than a maximum sum to be fixed by Congress, and that all further coinage shall be stopped at once, the silver purchased being held as bullion.

The Senate Set Promptly to Work on the Tariff Bill on its reassembling, and it is currently reported that if it should be rejected by the House, as is probable, it will be vigorously pressed, practically in its present shape, in the next Congress. All the internal revenue clauses of the bill were voted upon, and all the Democratic amendments were considered, and one of them accepted. There was very little debate—the bill having been exhaustively discussed in committee. Mr. Sherman gave notice that he had grave doubts as to the practicability of releasing from tax alcohol to be used in the arts without promoting great frauds, and that he would submit some amendments to this portion of the bill. This will take place after the committee of the whole has finished its duties, when there will probably be other amendments made.

England is Again Preparing for a Fight in the Soudan. A body of troops has been sent out to aid the Egyptian army in defending Suakim from the assaults of the Arabs. The expedition has called forth an indignant protest from Lord Randolph Churchill, who, since he ceased to be a member of the cabinet, has been a merciless critic of the policy of his former colleagues. Speaking in the House of Commons on December 4, he said that he believed that the Government was going against the advice of high and responsible military authorities. Within a few days a battle would be fought, and probably a desperate one, between British and Egyptian troops and Arab tribes. For what end were a mere handful of British soldiers exposed to the risk of an encounter with the Soudanese? They were a totally inadequate force, and the presence of 4,000 utterly unreliable Egyptians did not remove the danger. Even if success attended the battle it would necessitate larger operations in the interior. He implored the House to prevent renewed slaughter in the Soudan, and to save the lives of the soldiers who were being uselessly sacrificed. The House, however, rejected his advice by a large majority.

The Parnell Commission Examined Several important witnesses last week. Their testimony was, as much of the testimony previously given was not, pertinent to the subject of the inquiry, inasmuch as, if true, it proved that the League paid for the commission of outrages. The chief of these witnesses was a man named O'Connor, who said he had been a member of a secret society calling itself "The Boys." He took part in moonlight expeditions carrying guns and revolvers. Timothy Horan, secretary of a branch of the League, paid witness and nine others six shillings each on the occasion of one outrage. He also swore that Timothy Harrington had employed "The Boys" in an election. He instructed them not to kill voters, but only to frighten them greatly and compel them to sign voting papers. Those who refused were coerced and compelled to sign. Mr. Harrington paid the witness $35. All the members of the "inner circle" belonged to the League. Membership in the League was essential to membership in "The Boys." The commission has now adjourned for a month.

The Dreaded Second of December, the Anniversary of several momentous events in French history, passed over this year quietly in Paris. Extensive preparations were made to suppress any disorder that might arise, and at one time there were indications that a procession, organized to decorate the grave of a deputy who died fighting on the street-barricades on December 2, 1851, might commit outrages. The procession, however, was allowed to proceed unmolested, and it spent its strength in shouting "Long live the Republic!" singing the Marseillaise, and in other inoffensive ways. From thirty to forty thousand persons took part in it. Much to the relief of the law-abiding classes, there was no conflict with the mob. The significant feature of the celebration was the evident unpopularity of General Boulanger with the Communists. One of the most frequent cries was, "Down with Boulanger!" and the orator of the day clearly had him in mind when he said, "The democracy, acquiring renewed strength in the example of the glorious dead, is prepared to face Cæsarism, which is raising its head."

A Distinguished Advocate of Woman Suffrage has declared himself in England. In a speech delivered last week in Edinburgh, Lord Salisbury, the English Prime Minister, said he was in favor of woman suffrage, and he hoped the day was not far distant when women would be allowed to vote. He has, however, made no concession in his Irish policy. In the same speech he said, referring to the treatment of Irish political prisoners, that such treatment ought to deter others from following their example, and that so long as such offenders were dangerous to the community, they must be treated like other offenders. He warned the unionists to watch Mr. Gladstone, who, he said, was showing an increasing tendency to accept the extremest views of the separatists. There was growing in Mr. Gladstone's mind a distinct idea of the entire separation of Ireland.

Rumors of the Serious Illness of the Emperor of Germany were current last week. The Emperor's physicians reported that he was suffering from a catarrhal affection and prohibited his going out of doors. Persons usually well informed, however, assert that his illness is a renewal of his periodical ear trouble, which develops at intervals, and is expected ultimately to affect his brain. He employed part of his enforced leisure in elaborating the details of further army and navy reforms. He kept his military cabinet very busy, demanding immediate reports on a variety of questions. The officials of the Cabinet find his incessant activity something too much for them. He keeps them working sometimes night and day, insisting that there be no delay in the reports he demands, his unvarying orders being to reply within twenty-four hours.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored clergymen in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $15. They are: from China, Me., $1; W. Lebanon, Ind., $1; Lacota, Mich., 50 cents; Independence, Mo., $1; Spokane Falls, Wash. Ter., $1; Lewiston, Penn., $1; Syracuse, N. Y., $3; Starbuck, Wash. Ter., 50 cents; Westford, Penn., $1; Baltimore, Md., $1; Denbigh, Ont., Canada, $4. "During the past twelve months," says one of these clergymen, in a letter received last week, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which was sent to us through the kindness of some good friend subscribing to your fund, has been a shining light in our home, and has been a great help to me in my mission work among our people. They are always very poor, and this year many of them having lost their crops through freshets, they are still less able than ever to pay a preacher. My income is therefore very small, and I cannot afford to pay a subscription, but I shall miss the HERALD terribly." Many such letters come.

A Large Audience was Held Spell-bound in the Fourth Presbyterian Church in 34th Street, New York, on Tuesday December 4, by the deeply interesting lecture of Bishop H. C. Riley, of Mexico. The Bishop's stereopticon views illustrating his journeys in the Holy Land, in Spain, Mexico, and Central America, are of a very superior order, and were watched with intense interest. The views of the Mount of Olives, the Garden of Gethsemane, and the Sea of Tiberias were especially vivid, and enabled the spectator to realize better than before the scenes of the most momentous events in human history. Bishop Riley gave an eloquent and impressive sketch of the work in Mexico, and of the vast possibilities of usefulness which the present condition of that land affords. Ministers of churches could give their people a very high gratification, and might at the same time help to arouse public interest in Bishop Riley's important work, by inviting him to lecture.

The Value of Three Fingers was Assessed last week by the Supreme Court of New York at two thousand dollars. The question was raised by a suit of a young man to recover damages for injuries which he received nine years ago. A little before that time he was employed as an errand boy in the service of a tinware manufacturer. His employer promoted him to work in the factory, and the boy, being ignorant of the machinery used, was injured. His right hand was caught in a belt and carried over the wheels, where it was so hurt that he had to lose three fingers. The employer contended that the injuries resulted from the boy's carelessness and negligence, and that, therefore, there was no ground for a suit for damages. The court decided against him. It held that the boy having been put to work where he was liable to be injured, and having had no instruction as to the nature of his danger, could not be considered negligent, and therefore he had a right to recover damages from the person who had placed him there. The employer was therefore ordered to pay $2,000 as compensation. When parents, anxious to secure worldly advantages for their children, place them in situations of spiritual danger, and they fall into sin, God will not hold them guiltless. But there can be no compensation then. (Lam. 5: 7.)

The Release of an Embezzler From Prison in Salem, Ore., on December 3, led to an affecting scene in the Governor's room. The man's crime had been a very gross breach of trust, with no extenuating circumstances, and it was supposed that he would have to serve out to the very last day the long term of imprisonment to which he had been sentenced. His wife, however, was not daunted by the obstacles in the way of a pardon. She left her home in Washington, D. C., where she was well provided for, and devoted her whole time to intercession with every one whose influence could aid in obtaining her husband's release. No one pitied the criminal, but few could resist the wife's pleading, and ultimately she gained the signatures of so many influential men, and her cause was so strongly endorsed, that the Governor yielded and pardoned her husband. When at last the wife's efforts were crowned with success, the two went to the executive mansion to thank the Governor, and his Excellency, addressing the released man said: "If you ever speak an unkind word to that little woman, you ought to be returned to the place from which you have just been released for the remainder of your natural life. You owe her a debt that can only be repaid by a life of truest devotion." Every one will agree with the Governor. Ingratitude in such a case would be very base. But what shall be said of those who, having been rescued from a far worse fate by the death of Christ, are unmindful of their obligations? (1 Cor. 6: 20.)

The Suicide of a Rejected Lover is Reported from Boston, Mass. A young man in good circumstances in South Boston, about a year ago became engaged to a young lady who lived near him. He loved her passionately, and was overjoyed when she accepted him and promised to become his wife. He set about making preparations for their marriage, and was full of hope as to his future happiness. His friends frequently rallied him on the ardor of his affection, which grew more intense as the time set for the marriage approached. But for some cause, which the report does not disclose, the lady's affection cooled, and three weeks ago she plainly told him that she would never marry him. The lover was heart-broken, and when he found that his rejection was irrevocable he lost all interest in life. Finally, after bearing his disappointment a few days, he resolved to take his own life. He went to a Boston hotel, and deliberately suffocated himself with gas. Various indications about the room in which he died, showed that he had completely lost his reason. He is not the first lover, by thousands, who has so centred his affections on a woman that, when she has disappointed him, life seemed not worth living. No man or woman is in danger of being overcome by any such disappointment who loves God supremely. He changes not, and His love affords a refuge for the mourner that keeps him from despair. (Mal 3: 6.)

A Curious Delusion Came Before a Philadelphia court on December 3, in a charge of assault brought by a lady against a man of respectability and generally blameless character. The lady said that the defendant came to her house and requested an interview with her sister, a middle-aged lady, who was on a visit to her. As her sister had been annoyed before by the same man, she declined allowing him to see her. Then the man became violent, declared that her sister was his wife, and insisted that he had a right to see her. When the refusal was maintained the man became furious, and declaring that no one should keep his wife from him, assaulted the lady and endeavored to make his way to the room where he supposed her sister was. Thereupon a policeman was called in and the intruder was arrested. In court the man persisted in his claim that he was married to the lady whom he went to see, but on being cross-examined he was unable to produce any proof of his assertion. It was shown that he had been ardently attached to the lady from his boyhood, and his infatuation had so affected his mind, as at length to produce the delusion that he was really married to her. Hence his strange behavior at her sister's residence. There is reason to fear that many who now cherish the belief that they are united to Christ by an eternal bond will at last find themselves similarly mistaken. The outward and visible church has many members whose Godless lives prove that they are destitute of the faith and purity which alone can make them part of Christ's bride. (Luke 13: 26, 27.)

Millions of Dollars go to a Waif Rescued by the Children's Society of New York, as the heir of a wealthy citizen. Mr. Gerry, the president of the society, is the authority for the story. He told a reporter that in 1876 an agent of the society was in one of the city police courts when a man and his wife were on trial for drunkenness. It was a very gross case, and when they were sentenced it was shown that they had also maltreated their child, a bright, intelligent looking boy. The officer asked for the custody of the boy, and the judge granted his request. Shortly afterward, while he was in charge of the society, a wealthy gentleman saw him, heard his story, and took an interest in him. He brought his wife to see him, and she too was attracted by the lad. Finally legal papers were drawn up, and the society turned the boy over for adoption to his rich friend. He was sent to school and afterward to college, his progress fully justifying the good opinion of the couple who adopted him. The gentleman is just dead, and he has left his large fortune in equal shares to his wife and adopted son. The latter's share is over two millions, and he will doubtless inherit the other two when the widow dies, as she is passionately fond of him. Doubtless the boy's good fortune will make him the object of envy of other boys; but they may know that a far higher position is open to them all. They may become the adopted sons of the King of kings, and heirs of all things. (Rom. 8, 16, 17).

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. C. S. Billings is conducting services in Nebraska, with much success. Omaha, Neb., is his permanent address.

The Rev. H. W. Brown is meeting with much success in Indiana. Reports of the meetings at Goshen and Vincennes are very encouraging.

Mr. E. W. Bliss, of Chicago, whose work both in the East and West is well known, proposes to resume evangelistic labor at the beginning of next year.

At the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, on December 6, Professor George M. Powell, of Philadelphia, read a paper on the "Cash Value of Conscience."

The Rev. Alexander Patterson, of Chicago, intends devoting himself entirely to evangelistic work through the winter. His address is, Y. M. C. A., Chicago.

Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D. D., has commenced a course of Sunday afternoon lectures on the errors of Romanism, at Cooper Union, N. Y. They begin at 3 o'clock.

The Berkeley Street Church, Boston, has decided to send Mr. Noyes, at its own expense, as a missionary to Japan, as he has been rejected by the American Board.

The General Mission Committee of the Methodist Church has appropriated $1,200,000 for missions for the coming year. Of this sum $567,000 are for foreign missions.

A Christian Convention on Holiness and Divine Healing will be held at Portland, Me., on December 20. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing Rev. D. W. Lelacheur, Portland, Me.

In Illinois there are now 208 Christian Endeavor societies, with over 12,000 members, nearly half of them having been formed during the year. The largest society is connected with the Warren Avenue Church of Chicago.

Bishop William Taylor sailed from New York for Africa, on the S. S. Gallia, on December 1. On the evening of November 30 a farewell meeting was held in Jane Street Church. The Bishop said he had no dread of going back.

The Rev. C. H. Yatman's work at Galveston Tex., will long be gratefully remembered by the clergymen of the city. The Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist churches united in the meetings, and all have been blessed themselves, and increased in numbers.

The new edifice of the First Congregational Church of Northampton, Mass., was ruined by fire on November 28. The building cost $65,000, and was insured for $50,000. The parish had the famous Jonathan Edwards as its pastor for twenty-three years. This is the fifth church building erected by the society.

The Sunday-school teachers of New York are deriving great benefit from meeting on Saturday evening to converse on the International Lesson for the next day. Dr. Kittredge conducts the meeting and answers questions. The meeting is held in Madison Avenue Reformed Church at 57th Street at 8 o'clock.

The American Board of Foreign Missions recently received notice of the death of the Rev. Harry Gardiner, who was being trained for mission work in Zululand. Two days later the Board received an application for an appointment from a student in the Pacific Theological Seminary, who expressed a preference for the Zulu field.

The Next Few Weeks will be the best time for canvassing for new subscribers. We are happy to learn that many of our friends are already introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among their friends and neighbors. Any one desiring sample copies for this purpose, will be supplied free of cost by writing for them, stating explicitly how many can be advantageously used. Address "The Manager." 63 Bible House, New York.

PICTURE the Lord and His apostles at the holy Supper! A world of interest centres here. Two figures strangely different met in this scene—met, shortly afterwards to part, and never to meet again. To look upon them, they seemed equally disciples of Jesus, and from the position which one of them occupied, as leaning on the Lord's bosom, and the other as the treasurer of the Master's little store, they seemed to be equally trusted and honored followers of the great Lord. You might not have known, by mere sight, which was the better man of the two—John or Judas. Most probably you would have preferred the gentle manners of John; but I should suppose—for our Lord never chose a man to an office unless he had some qualification—you would also have admired the calm prudence of Judas, and his quiet business tact. They sat at the same table, engaged in the same exercises, and looked much the same kind of men. None of us would have guessed that one of them was John the divine, and the other was Judas the devil.

There is something very solemn about this meeting of such strangely different characters in one common act, and in the society of the same divine Lord. John is here; is Judas here? Let the question be started and passed round, "Lord, is it I?" He is the least likely to be the traitor who is Nearest to His Lord's Heart.

He who occupies such a place as John did is not the betrayer. Oh that we might be fired with a loving ambition to be the disciple whom Jesus loved, leaning on Jesus' bosom! for then, though we ask the question, "Lord, is it I?" it will not linger long upon our hearts; for His love, shed abroad within them, shall answer every question of self-examination, and we shall cry, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Let that stand as an introduction. And now our remarks will be very simple.

I. And the first is this—

of their Lord. The Lord had a people around Him who were His disciples. Within them He had twelve. Within the twelve He had three. Within the three He had one disciple whom He loved. Probably our Lord's attachment to John was partly a human one; and so far as it was human, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now after the flesh know we even Him no more. There may, also, have been such affection in Jesus toward John as there would be in any eminent Christian toward another Christly believer—in any one whom the Lord made to be a leader of His church, toward such and such a member of that church in whom He could see most of the lovely characteristics of Christ. I cannot but think that it was so. But it strikes me that our Lord Jesus loved John in some measure more than the rest, in the entirety of his character, as Jesus Christ, the Son of God as well as the Son of man. He loved all His own then, and He loves all His own now. There is infinite love in the heart of Jesus toward all His people; and if there be any degrees in that love, yet the lowest degree is inconceivably great. The very least member of the divine family may say, "He loved me, and gave Himself for me." He loves us beyond all human expression. We are quite sure of this. Yet that love has this difference about it, that it is more enjoyed by some on earth than by others.

It is clear, as a matter of fact, that the divine love is manifested to some more clearly than to others. My beloved brethren, you must know this to be the case; for there are those among us who walk with God, who enjoy the light of Jehovah's countenance at all times, who if depressed have the art of rolling their burden upon the Lord, and soon are delivered from it. You know them; they are the brethren who feel like singing all the while, for Jesus is their friend, and they rejoice in him. There was one in the Old Testament who was called "a man greatly beloved," and there are Daniels on Earth.

Christ has among women still his Marys, whom he loves. He loved Martha, too; but still there was a special place for Mary. Jesus has still his Johns, whom he peculiarly loves. There are first as well as last. All may be of Israel, but all the tribes are not Judah, and in Judah all the men are not Davids. Who shall deny that there are degrees in grace? Have we not among us babes, and young men, and fathers? Have we not first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear? It is so; and though I will not argue for degrees in glory, and, indeed, deprecate the spirit in which the doctrine of degrees in glory is often set forth, yet we are sure, for we see it with our eyes, that there are degrees of grace, and especially degrees in the enjoyment of the love of Jesus. Amongst those who do really love their Lord, and are really loved by him, one star differeth from another in that love.

Why Was It John

that was "that disciple whom Jesus loved"? Certainly it was not because he was naturally higher in rank than the others, for he was a fisherman, like the most of them; and James was certainly equal in birth, for he was his brother. Our blessed Lord did not love John because of any excess of talent; for albeit that John's Apocalypse and his Gospel are, in some respects, the highest parts of revealed Scripture, being both the simplest and the most mysterious portions of Holy Writ, yet we should not say that John betrayed evidence of so great a mind in itself, naturally, or by education, as Paul had. He had as much talent as his Lord gave him, but there was nothing about him so special that he should for that cause have been loved; and, to dismiss the thought with a word, Jesus never loves men on account of talent, and we should be unwise if we ourselves did so. These things are external. Our Lord loved John, specially, for a better reason than that.

Men love those that are like them, and Jesus, as man, loved John because the processes of grace had developed in John the image of Jesus. John, like his Lord, had much love. He may have lacked some qualities in which Peter, and James, and others excelled, but he towered above them all in love. He was full of tenderness, and therefore his Master at once selected him to be His choicest companion and His dearest friend. You know the way, then, to the heart of Christ. Let your own heart be full of love, and you will know His love. You greatly need, not a great head, but a great heart. You must have, not more knowledge, but more affection; not a higher rank in society, but a higher rank in the power to love Jesus and to love your fellow-men. Less of self, and more of Jesus, and then you shall enjoy more of His love.

This being the case, that John had this loving spirit, and our Lord Jesus Christ loved him more than others, it led on to the fact that John was the recipient of confidences from Christ which others had not. Jesus and He left him in His will all His earthly possessions. You will say to me, "And pray, what possessions had the Master?" Well, He had one possession of which He was very fond, and He could not die until He had disposed by His last will and testament of that one earthly possession. It was His mother. He loved her, and must care for her; and there passed a little word, a kind of sign, between Him and John at the last moment. Do not think that John would have understood what Jesus meant when He said: "Woman, behold thy son," and, "Son, behold thy mother!" if there had not been a quiet talk about that matter some time before. But Jesus, I doubt not, had told John that the only earthly care He had, as man, was that while He was away slumbering in the grave He would have His mother cared for still, and so He left her in John's charge.

If you love Jesus Christ very much, He will leave something in your charge, depend upon that; and the more you love Him, the more will He trust you with some loving commission which He would not trust with anybody else. I have known Him leave a dear child of His, some dear old saint, for a favored believer to look after, whom He never would have had to look after if Jesus had not said: "I love this dear old saint, and I shall commit him—I shall commit her—to the custody of such a one, because he loves Me, and he will take care of this poor one for My sake." Some of you have nobody to care for. Do you not grieve to think that you lack this token of His special love? As sure as ever there is any intimate love between Jesus and any soul, He trusts that soul with something to be done, to be endured, to be guarded, to be mourned over, or in some way to become a sacred trust.

II. Now, secondly, we note that the beloved ones count this to be

Their Greatest Honor.

This is evidently in the text; for John, who wrote these words, called himself "one of His disciples, whom Jesus loved"; and I think three times besides he speaks of himself as "that disciple whom Jesus loved." He took his name from his Lord's love, which he evidently counted to be his greatest honor. This was John's most notable title. As a servant of the Queen, having distinguished himself in the service of her Majesty, becomes the lord of such and such a town, and he takes the name of the place as a name of honor, so John drops his own birth-given name, as it were, and takes this title instead of it—"that disciple whom Jesus loves."

Now, had John been proud he would have altered the title thus. He would have said, "That disciple who loved Jesus." This would have been true, though not modest. There was, as far as his heart was capable of it, a reciprocity of love between John and Jesus. If Jesus loved him, he loved Jesus: but John never called himself "That disciple who loved Jesus." No, for he felt as if his own love was altogether unworthy of mention in the presence of the love of Jesus.

Then notice also, as if to show us that there was no pride in taking the title, that he does not say, "John was the disciple whom Jesus loved." We gather from other facts that it was John. All the traditions and beliefs of the early church went to testify that it was John. We have not, any of us, any doubt about the fact that it was John. It has, as it were, leaked out; but John nowhere says that he was the man. All that he has said is "That disciple whom Jesus loved"; and thus he makes the love more conspicuous than the person who received it. We know that it must have been John, for many reasons; but still he does not say so. He hides John behind the love of Jesus, which proves that John gloried in the love of Christ, but did not boast of it egotistically.

III. A step farther. This special love

Brings Special Privileges.

It brought to John the first privilege of being very near to Jesus, his Lord. At that supper he was nearest to the place which Jesus occupied. But his position of being nearest was brought about by his being best loved. He was nearest in fellowship because dearest in love. Now, beloved, if you are best loved by Christ, you live nearest to Him. I am sure of it. If you love Him best, and He loves you best, you will be more in prayer than others; you will spend more time alone with Jesus than other Christians do. You will abound in petition and praise. You will read His Word with greater diligence;

you will drink it in with greater delight. You will live for Him, too, with greater consecration. Your whole time will be spent in His company. When you are at your work in the house, or the field, or the shop, you will still be with Him. The dearest must be the nearest. That is the first privilege.

The second was the privilege of using and receiving tokens of endearment. He leaned his head on Jesus' bosom, looking up into His face; and Jesus looked down on him. There was mutual endearment, for Jesus loved him, and

He Loved Jesus.

As for John, it must have been a heaven below to be thus in the bosom of his Lord. He mentions it three times, you see; twice in this passage, and once in the last chapter of his gospel, where there was no necessity for mentioning it. He had such a recollection of his head having once been laid on his Lord's breast, that he must put it in when he is speaking about Peter and himself. He says, "The disciple which also leaned on His breast at supper, and said, Lord, which is he that betrayeth thee?" He must needs repeat the charming fact, for it was such a delight to him. O beloved, we cannot now touch the bosom of Jesus after the flesh, for He is gone up on high; but there are still most sweet endearments of spirit between the Lord Jesus and His loving disciples. I hope very many of you know this choice blessing of living in the immediate enjoyment of your Saviour's love. May you never lose it!

Then is there a third boon, not only of nearness and endearment, but of confidence toward the Lord; for it was a bold thing, surely, for John to lean his head on Christ's bosom. If you can get your very heart into His heart and come closer to Him than even John dared to do—if you carry that coming beyond all previous comings, yet Jesus neither will nor can resent the nearest approaches of any one of His believing people. We lose a great deal of Christ's loving fellowship because we are so formal and distant toward Him. Jesus seeks to reach our hearts, He stoops to our littleness; let us pluck up courage to draw near to Him.

Surely there was a great

Liberty Given to Him.

Some would have said he took a liberty in thus leaning where no head of king or emperor might aspire to rise. He was the most honored of all human beings; but surely he took great liberties. No, he did not, for the Lord Himself gave him access with boldness. Great love has privileges which make her boldest advances no intrusion. Love has the key of all the rooms of the Father's house. Love has the range of Paradise. Love may read the very heart of God. Love may come where she wills, and go unchallenged. John said to our Saviour, "Lord, who is it?" Jesus looked down at him and said, as if He did not want the others to know at all, "He it is to whom I shall give a sop." He had just to watch a little while. He that can most often pray the prayer of faith, he that can see farthest into Christ's mysteries, is the man whose heart loves Jesus best, and whose head lies most in the bosom of his Lord.

Now a step farther, and a very little more, and we have done. This creates Special Knowledge.

The special privileges of love lead on to a special knowledge of Christ. I do not think that any other evangelist notices Christ's emotion at the supper in the matter of his spirit as John has done. He writes, "When Jesus hath thus said, he was troubled in spirit," and so on. John was so close to the Lord, with his head on his breast, that he could tell, by the heaving of His bosom, that He was troubled. The mind of God is not so revealed to any man now that he can set up to foretell the future like a prophet; but, mark you, the choice ones amongst the saints have intimations of the mind of God about many things. Those who live at court can often foresee the king's movements when others cannot. It is my firm conviction that favored believers have tokens, warnings, and hints from above. Even the choicest spirits may not understand the Lord's meaning all at once; but if any man can read anything of the future, it is he that puts his head where all eyes grow clear, and all hearts become pure, even upon the breast of Jesus.

I have done, when I notice two things. The first is this—that the favored position which John occupied did not screen him from the necessity of asking the question, "Lord, is it I?" There really was no suspicion of him, nor any reason for such suspicion; but his heart was in a right state, and therefore he felt it necessary to say, "Lord, is it I?" as well as any of the rest. And I make this remark because the very persons who do not say, "Lord, is it I?" are those who ought to say it. If you are enjoying more of God's love to-night than ever you did in your life, yet do not profess to have climbed above the need of self-examination, when the question comes, "Art thou really one of His?" do not chase it away, as if it were an impertinence. Entertain the inquiry till you can satisfy it with a sufficient answer. It is not your bold talker that is your true lover after all. There is a confidence which is fatal.

The other remark, with which I finish, is this: That John's nearness to Christ did not authorize him to make answer to his fellow disciples, nor to judge any one of them. Time was when John might have sat in judgment over them. Did he not desire to sit upon a throne judging the twelve tribes of Israel with his brother James? But now that he has his head in his Lord's bosom, he is but far otherwise. His brethren keep asking, "Lord, is it I?" Peter makes signs to him. John does not presume to make a guess as to the traitor's name, but he softly says, "Lord, who is it?" He asked that question of his Lord; but he did not himself pitch upon Judas. No, he might, perhaps, have laid his suspicions upon someone else who would have been innocent. It was wise to refer the matter to the Lord.

Some say that they live very near to Jesus. It is an evil sign when men speak of their own attainments. These are the people who, in the next breath, begin to condemn others. But this is not after the manner of the beloved John. Some professors affirm that they are going to have a particularly fine place in the glory, all by themselves. I do not quite understand their theory, but I am sure I do not grudge any of my Master's servants any special honor they may desire. I have kept company on earth with such a poor lot of brethren, and I have learned to love them so well, that I would rather abide with them in their inferior heaven than rise with the cream of the cream into the upper places. I like to be with God's people of the poorer class, and of the more struggling and afflicted sort. I like to be with God's people who wrestle hard with sins and doubts and fears. If I get spoken to by my

Very Superior Brethren,

I find that I have very little pleasant fellowship with them, for I know nothing about their wonderful experience of freedom from conflict, and complete deliverance from every evil tendency. I have never won an inch of the way to heaven without fighting for it. I have never lived a day but I have had to sorrow over my imperfections. I sometimes get near to God, but at that time I weep most about my faults and failings. Although I have thus spoken after the manner of men, I do not believe in these superior beings, nor in their superior heaven.

I close by saying—you remember what Jesus said to Peter. Peter was always a little too fast, and he therefore ventured to peer into things which did not concern him, and so he said to Jesus, as he looked at John, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" He did not think badly of brother John; I should have been ashamed of Peter if he had done so. But still he said, "What shall this man do?" Our blessed Lord replied to him, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me." So, when you feel inclined, because you are growing in grace and becoming somebody, to say, "Lord, and what shall this poor member do? And what shall this imperfect brother be? What shall that poor, blundering new convert do?"—remember the words of Jesus: "What is that to thee? Follow thou me." Mind your Master, and mind yourself, and let your brethren stand or fall to their own Lord, as you must. Now, come and lay your head in your Lord's bosom, and never mind Peter. May God bless you, for Christ's sake!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A CITY BOARDING-HOUSE.*

HERE is a true sketch of one lodging-house. Flats are unknown in the part of the world where it stands, and it is a large house of four floors. On the ground floor is the dining-room, with a bedroom opening off it. A music-master has these rooms, and his piano jangles all day. On the first floor is the drawing-room, which is occupied by two ladies. The stair to the first floor is carpeted, and comparatively well lighted. On the next stair—in the ascent of which it is well to grip the banisters—there is a piece of ragged carpet here and there. Beyond that all is plain wood, which, however, is hidden from you unless you carry a candle. At the top of this stair the new lodger has his room. It looks out on chimney-tops, which is not a disadvantage in this street, where for a view you have to choose between the dingy houses opposite, and a lumpy plain of roofs. The room is of fair size, with a bed on one side and a dilapidated couch on the other. The occupant will have to use the bed as a sofa, for the couch gives way if it leaves the wall. There is a washstand flanked by two chairs; an aged easy-chair, which rocks uncomfortably, owing to a caster being missing; and two decaying tables. Nelson is dying at Trafalgar in a flashy frame on the wall. The ceiling is very low, as in nearly all London houses when you come higher than the second floor. There is no gas. The cost of the whole with board is eighteen shillings ($4.50) to thirty shillings ($7.50) weekly, according to the quality of board, and location.

A Dry Goods Clerk.

At first he is expected to "live in"—that is, to make his home on the premises of the firm. He will breakfast, dine, have tea, and sup at the warehouse or shop, and probably sleep on some adjacent premises, where his leisure time must be spent. About 7:30 A.M. every one is expected to have left the dormitory, and to be at the warehouse. In some houses the junior hands will have to use the broom, and sweep off the floor; in almost all they will be expected to dust the goods. This work done, the young man changes his clothes, arranges his toilet, and goes to breakfast. Tea, coffee, and bread and butter are the invariable fare. From 8:30 to noon he follows the usual routine of business life. Few customers have to be served before 11 o'clock, but there are cases to be unpacked, windows to be dressed, goods to be displayed, bales of stuff to be measured, and innumerable duties to be accomplished before the world comes to buy. At noon the first party goes to dinner: in most city houses it goes up to the third, fourth, or fifth floor. In some neighborhoods it often goes down to the dismal gas-lit cellar, or basement. Beer of a very indifferent quality is put on the table in pitchers for all who choose to drink. After dinner comes most of the buying and selling, and from 12 to 5 are the busiest hours of the day. A quarter of an hour is allowed for tea, after which the day's work is wound up. The place is closed to the public at 6, and except in busy times most of the employees are at liberty to leave about 7, and do what they like with the hours until 11.

A Mother's Prayers Answered.

I have now been five years in London, and well do I remember my first impressions. I had had one situation, and then came into a London warehouse. My father and mother were Christians—good examples to me—but they never warned me of the temptations I should be subjected to. Probably parents think their example sufficient. It is a good thing, example, but not enough. A few words from them would have put me on my guard. I was not then a Christian. The house I went to, I suppose, is like many more in town—contained many men who laughed at virtue, and extolled vice. Such were my associates. For a time I stood my ground, but gradually got accustomed to many objectionable things, did not notice them, and then (although I detested swearing) I did not mind hearing or making a joke about vice. I then met an old school-mate, who was not particularly moral, and we attended several restaurants together. Luckily he gave me the cold shoulder subsequently, and I was thus, perhaps, prevented from going further into dissipation. The chance, as some might call it, was, I am sure, the restraining grace of God in answer to a praying mother. As I look back, I can now see plainly how it was I was not allowed to go my own way; the prayers of a believing mother were answered, and I was converted to Christ a month after her death.

MRS. MARY McKEE.

Daughter of the President-Elect.

THE beautiful and winsome lady whose portrait appears on this page, is to be one of the ladies who will conduct the hospitalities of the White House during the term of General Harrison. She is about twenty-seven years of age, and is married to Mr. J. R. McKee, a wholesale boot and shoe dealer in Indianapolis. She is no stranger in Washington, for when her father was Senator Harrison she made many friends among the young people at the Federal capital, who will be glad to resume their friendly relations with her. Mrs. McKee has two children: Benjamin Harrison McKee, who will be two years old in March next, and Mary Lodge McKee, who will be eight months old.

Mrs. McKee is a well-skilled musician, like her mother, excelling as a performer on the piano. She is a sprightly, interesting woman, and the responsibilities of married life have not taken from her that charming liveliness which made her so popular when she was a belle in Washington.

THE GOSPEL AMONG EASTERN JEWS.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most interesting spheres of Christian work is that at Jaffa, and other Eastern cities, where an effort is now being made to bring Jews to see in "Jesus of Nazareth the Messiah promised to their fathers. The illustration on this page depicts one branch of this work—that of a colporteur circulating New Testaments and gospel portions among the Jews who frequent that centre of trade. Their work has been much blessed, and though many still live on in wilful and obstinate blindness, others have been drawn, by the majestic life of Jesus, to love and serve Him. Here, also, Bible-women have been greatly blessed among the females of the locality. The senior Bible-woman at Jaffa, a Christian Jewess, is named Hannah. The following incident shows the character of her work. She says: "I was going from house to house, and in a yard I found seven or eight families. A woman came to me, saying, 'Are you a Bible-woman?' I answered, 'Yes.' She said, 'I do not wish you to come into my yard; I will fence it round.' 'But I must come to let you hear the Word,' I said. 'I will shut the door, that you may not come in! I don't want to hear your Book. I belong to the people of God, and do not want to be taught by you,' the woman answered. 'But,' said I, 'the people of God wish to hear His Holy Word, and they read His Book, and love those who read it; but you are contrary to all this; from this it appears that you are a lost sheep of the House of Israel.'

"Then the woman went into her house; but the neighbors called me, saying, 'Come here; if she does not want to hear the Book of God, we do; please read to us.' So I read to them about the lost lamb. Then the woman was much ashamed, and came back to listen very quietly. Some said, 'We know how to pray to God.' I answered, 'It is not enough; we must act as we pray.' Some call me into their houses and gather themselves together to hear the Word of God."

WAS that the clatter of a horse's hoofs? The girl who sat listlessly sewing at the foot of a large tree, against which she rested her back, was alert in a moment, and looked eagerly toward the gate which opened from the lane into the park, where she sat. Yes, a horse was trotting down the lane, but it was not the horse she was looking for, and, still more to the purpose, its rider was a good twenty years older than the man whose coming was the one event wanting to make the glorious summer morning perfect bliss to Rose Berkley. An expression of disappointment escaped her lips, and she resumed the work which she was doing for her sister, the clergyman's wife, with whom she was spending the summer. It seemed to Rose a long time that she had waited; the work made little progress and at last dropped unheeded on her lap, as the dark eyes closed, and she slept.

At the time Rose took her seat under the tree, a horseman was riding rapidly some two miles away, with that tree as his destination. It was a familiar road to him, though in former years he had been accustomed to travel half a mile farther upon it than he intended to do this morning. But at that time the object of his journeys had been an hour or two of talk with his brother clergyman, the husband of Rose's sister, a discussion of theological problems, consultation about methods of aggressive Christian work, and always an earnest prayer together for God's blessing on their work for the Master. That was before Rose made her appearance at the parsonage. Since then, and since she had promised to be his wife, Grey had spent less time with his friend, and found his great enjoyment in wandering with Rose through the woods, or, stretched on the velvety turf at her side beneath their favorite tree, in talking to her of his work, his hopes and aspirations. There had never been much love-talk between them, for Grey was too much absorbed in his labors, and too intense in his habits of thought, to have the disposition for uttering the airy nothings which make the staple of the conversation of more shallow lovers. Rose did not understand much of what he said; but she loved him passionately, and with a reverence that had made her for the first time in her life really in earnest in spiritual thought and life. She wanted to be worthy of him, and to be what a wife should be—her husband's confidante and companion.

Grey would have been at the tree long before Rose fell asleep but for a catastrophe, which was one of those mysterious dispensations of Providence that perplex Christians and drive them back to the firm faith which trusts God and loves Him, in spite of events that must wait for eternity to explain. As he was taking a cross-cut over a rising ground to the main road, he saw a carriage approaching at frightful speed. Two ladies were in it, and they had in their terror abandoned the effort to control the excited horses, and were clinging convulsively to each other in helpless despair.

Grey put his horse instantly to a gallop and entered the road a hundred yards ahead of the runaway span. He dismounted and planted himself directly in their way, ready to clutch the reins when they came up. The horses seemed to understand his intention, and swerved as they came to where he stood. He bounded forward, however, and caught the reins, but not so effectually as he had hoped. Hanging to them with all his might, he checked the speed of the horses, but as he was dragged along, he fell, and, before he had brought them completely to a stand, he had been trampled upon and crushed. It was a lonely country road in which the accident had occurred, and before the two ladies could recover their presence of mind and obtain assistance, the brave man who had saved their lives had breathed his last.

Rose Berkley's Morning Tryst.

For a long time after the news was broken to her, Rose lay hovering between life and death. When, at length, her young strength triumphed over the shock, and it was known that she would live, she would sit silently thinking of her dead lover for hours, and then would fall into fits of weeping, that were the relief to her crushed heart that saved her from losing her reason. It was through her brother-in-law that at last light and spiritual strength came to enable her to live out her life.

"You will see him again," he said. "Would you not like, when you meet him, to tell him that you tried in some measure to do the work he hoped you would have done as his wife? Could you not live among the people whose eternal interests were so near his heart, and cheer their burdened lives and lead them to Christ? Their need is terrible; Grey saw it, and consecrated his life to pointing them to the only remedy. Some one else will come to do it, but he wanted you to do what neither he nor any man could do in the homes, with the women and children. You can do that still, and as you work for Christ among those poor darkened souls who are ignorantly rejecting the joy and blessedness that Christ could give them, you will feel that Grey's dearest hopes are being realized."

Poor Rose grasped the idea eagerly. It kept her still associated in heart and life with her dear dead love, and as she gradually entered into the life of usefulness to which her brother-in-law pointed her, and saw one and another workingman's home transformed by her gentle teaching and ministrations, and darkened lives brightened by the sweetness and light of the Saviour's love, her own sorrow grew lighter. Her life became a busy one, and in its labors a sweet calm and holy restfulness took the place of bitter and unavailing sorrow.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Under the Spell.

MUCH that I had heard at the Mormon meetings could, I knew, be proved true from Scripture; and the rest seemed to me to be capable of demonstration from the same authority. I resolved, however, to fortify myself against a too easy credulity, and thought that probably if I heard more of these doctrines, I might be able to discover their falsity.

On the following day, the elder who had preached at the meeting, and who, by the way, is one of the present proprietors of the Salt Lake Herald, called specially to see me, as he had been intimate with my parents before they left the island. I hardly knew how to be civil to him, though he had done nothing to offend me, nor had he been the cause of my parents entering the Mormon Church; but I disliked him solely on account of the stories which I had heard about the Mormons. Intending only to be kind to me, he told me that on the following day he proposed to take the steamer to Southampton, as he was going to attend a conference of the Saints in London, and that he should be pleased to show me any attentions while crossing the Channel, and would see me safe home. I confess I really felt insulted at a Mormon Elder offering to be my escort; and although my trunks were ready packed for my departure by the same steamer, and Mr. Dunbar knew it, I thanked him politely, but said I would not go by that boat. He tried to persuade me to change my mind, and said that I should have to wait a whole week for another vessel; and at last I told him the abhorrence I felt at the strange things I had heard about the Mormons, and that I should be afraid to travel in the same steamer with him or any of the Mormon Elders, whom I regarded as no better than so many whited sepulchres. He, however, kindly took no offence, for he knew that I had been listening to those who disliked the Saints.

I felt ashamed at having been betrayed into such unladylike rudeness, but, notwithstanding, tried to persuade myself that his civility was, after all, an insult; for I had conceived an intense detestation of every Mormon, on account of the deception which I felt sure had been practiced upon my family. This feeling was not lessened by the consciousness that an impression had been made upon my own mind. The more in accordance with Scripture the teaching of the Elders appeared, the more firmly I believed it must be a powerful delusion. Here, I said, Satan has indeed taken the form of "an angel of light, to deceive, if possible, the very elect."

Elder Dunbar, finding me unyielding, left by the next steamer, and had a pleasant passage across the Channel, and I remained on the island another week. During that interval, my mind was haunted with what I had heard of this "new Gospel dispensation," as it was called. That angels had again descended from heaven to teach man upon earth; that a prophet had been raised up to speak again the mind of the Lord to the children of men; that the Saints were partakers of the gifts of the Spirit, as in the early Christian Church—all these assumed facts took the form of reality, and came back into my mind with greater force every time I strove to drive them away; just as our thoughts do when we desire to sleep, and cannot—our very efforts to dismiss them bring them back with greater force to torment us. We had an unusually bad passage across the Channel, which annoyed me all the more when I remembered my scornful refusal to go in the same boat with Elder Dunbar.

On my arrival in Southampton I soon discovered that my father, mother, and sisters were full of the spirit of Mormonism. They were rejoicing in it, ardently believing that it was "the fullness of the everlasting Gospel," as the Elders styled it; and whatever I might think of the new religion, I was forced to confess that it brought into my father's house peace, love, kindness, and charity, such as were seldom seen in many households of religious people. My sisters were completely changed in their manner of life. They cared nothing for the amusements which girls of their age generally crave and enjoy. Their whole thoughts seemed to be occupied with the church, attending the meetings of the Saints, and employing every leisure hour in preparing comforts for the Elders, who were travelling and preaching without purse and scrip. And in all this they were as happy as children.

Of my parents I might say the same. My dear mother rejoiced in the belief that she had been peculiarly blessed in being privileged to live at a time when "the last dispensation" was revealed; and my father, though an invalid, rejoiced that he had entered into the kingdom by baptism. Such was the condition of my father's house; and who can wonder that, accustomed as I was to listen with respect to the opinions of my parents, I was more than ever troubled about the new religion which they had adopted? The first Sunday morning that I was in England, my parents asked me to accompany them to meeting, and I readily complied, as I wanted to hear more of the strange doctrines which in some mysterious way had made our family so happy, but which in other quarters had provoked such bitter hostility. I know now that this joyousness of heart is not peculiar to new converts to Mormonism, but may be found among the newly converted of every sect which allows the emotional feelings to come into play. To me, however, it was a mystery, but I must confess that the change which had taken place in those nearest and dearest to me, affecting me personally, and being apparently in accordance with the teaching of the Saviour, led me to regard Mormonism with less antipathy. The bright side alone of the new faith was presented to the world abroad; we had yet to go to Utah and witness the effects of Brigham Young's teachings at home before we could know what Mormonism really was.

I shall never forget the trial it was to my pride to enter the dirty, mean-looking room where the Saints assembled at that time. No one would rent a respectable hall to them, and they were glad to obtain the use of any place which was large enough for their meetings. On the present occasion there was a very fair gathering of people, who had come together influenced by the most varied motives. The presiding Elder—I should here remark that the word "Elder" has among the Mormons no reference whatever to age, but is simply a rank in the priesthood—called the meeting to order and read the following hymn:

"The morning breaks, the shadows flee;
Lo! Zion's standard is unfurled!
The dawning of a brighter day
Majestic rises on the world.

The clouds of error disappear
Before the rays of truth Divine;
The glory bursting from afar,
Wide o'er the nations soon shall shine!

The Gentile fullness now comes in,
And Israel's blessings are at hand,
Lo! Judah's remnant, cleansed from sin,
Shall in the promised Canaan stand.

Angels from heaven and truth from earth
Have met, and both have record borne;
Thus Zion's light is bursting forth
To bring her ransom'd children home."

Every word of this hymn had a meaning, peculiar to itself, relating to the distinctive doctrines of the Saints. The congregation sang with an energy and enthusiasm which made the room shake again. Self and the outer world were alike forgotten, and an ecstacy of rapture seemed to possess the souls of all present. Then all kneeled down, and prayer was offered for the Prophet, the apostles, high-priests, "seventies," elders, priests, teachers, and deacons; blessings were invoked upon the Saints, and power to convert the Gentiles; and as the earnest words of supplication left the speaker's lips, the congregation shouted a loud "Amen!" There was no prepared sermon. There never is at a Mormon meeting. The people are taught that the Holy Ghost is "mouth, matter, and wisdom." Whatever the preaching Elder may say is supposed to come directly by inspiration from heaven, and the Saints, listening, as they believe, not to his utterances, but to the words of God Himself, have nothing to do but to hear and obey.

The first speaker on this occasion was a young gentleman of respectable family, who had been recently baptized and ordained. He, too, was from St. Helier's, and I had known him from childhood. His address impressed me very much. He had been a member of the Baptist church, and he related his experience: told how often he had wondered why there were not inspired men to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the world to-day, as there were eighteen centuries ago. He spoke of the joy which he had experienced in being baptized into the Mormon Church, and realizing that he had received the "gift of the Holy Ghost." The simplicity with which he spoke, his evident honesty, and the sacrifice he had made in leaving the respectable Baptists and joining the despised Mormons, were, I thought, so many evidences of his sincerity.

Alas! how little could that young preacher conjecture how different the practical Mormonism in Utah was from the theoretical Mormonism which he had learned to believe in Europe, before polygamy was known among the Saints. A short time afterwards he gave up his business, married an accomplished young lady, and went with her to Salt Lake City. There they were soon utterly disgusted with what they witnessed, apostatized, and set out for England. When they had gone three-fourths of their way back to the Missouri River, the young man, his wife, child, and another apostate and his wife, were killed by "Indians"—such, at least, was the report; but dissenting Mormons have always charged their "taking off" to the order of the leaders of the Mormon Church.

But to return to the meeting: The reader must please forgive me if I dwell a little upon the events of that particular morning, for naturally they made a deep impression upon my own mind—it was there that I saw for the first time my husband who was to be. I had heard a good deal about a certain Elder, from my family and from the Saints who visited at our house. They spoke with great enthusiasm of the earnestness with which he preached, of the effect which his addresses produced, and of his confidence in the final triumph of "the kingdom."

At that time—the summer of 1849—although the branch of the Mormon Church in Britain was in a most flourishing condition, there were not in England more than two or three American Elders preaching the faith, for when—two years before the period of which I speak—the Saints left Nauvoo and undertook that most extraordinary exodus across the Plains to the Rocky Mountains, the missionary Elders were all called home, and the work of proselytizing in Europe was left entirely to the native Elders. To direct their labors, there was placed over them an American Elder named Orson Spencer, a graduate of Dartmouth University, a scholar and a gentleman—a man well calculated from his previous Christian education to give an elevated tone to the teachings of the young English missionaries.

Mormonism in England then, had no resemblance to the Mormonism of Utah to-day. The Mormons were then simply an earnest, religious people, in many respects like the Methodists, especially in their missionary zeal and fervor of spirit. The Mormon Church abroad was purely a religious institution, and Mormonism was preached by the Elders as the Gospel of Christianity restored. The Church had no political shaping, nor the remotest antagonism to the civil power. The name of Joseph Smith was seldom spoken, and still more seldom was heard the name of Brigham Young, and then only so far as they had reference of the Church of the Saints.

About eighteen months before I visited Southampton, one of the Mormon missionaries had come into that town, "without purse or scrip." He was quite a young man and almost penniless, but he was rich in faith and overflowing with zeal. He knew no one there; and homeless, and frequently hungry, he continued his labors. Of fasting he knew much, of feasting nothing. He first preached under the branches of a spreading beech-tree in a public park, and when more favored he held forth in a school-room or public hall. He had come to convert the people to Mormonism, or he was going to die among them; and before such zeal and determination, discouragements, of course, soon vanished away.

He troubled the ministers of other dissenting churches when they found him distributing tracts and talking to their people. He was sowing, broadcast, dissatisfaction and discontent wherever he could get any one to listen to him, and thus he drew down upon himself the eloquence of the dissenting pulpits and the derision of the local press. But the more they attacked him the more zealously did he labor, and defied his opponents to public discussion. Mormonism was bold then in Europe—it had no American history to meet in those days. This, and a great deal more, I had heard discussed in glowing language by my relatives and friends; and thus the young missionary—Elder Stenhouse—was, by name, no stranger to me.

It was Elder Stenhouse who now addressed the meeting, and I listened to him with attention. The reader must remember that at that time polygamy was unheard of as a doctrine of the Saints; and the blood-atonement, the doctrine that Adam is God, together with the polytheism and priestly theocracy of after-years, were things undreamed of. The saving love of Christ, the glory and fullness of the everlasting Gospel, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, together with repentance, baptism, and faith, were the points upon which the Mormon teachers touched; and who can wonder that with such topics as these, and fortifying every statement with powerful and numerous texts of Scripture, they should captivate the minds of religiously inclined people? However this may be, I can only confess that, as I listened to Elder Stenhouse's earnest discourse, I felt my antipathy to Mormonism rapidly melting away.

At the close of the service, when he left the platform, he was warmly received by the brethren and sisters—for so the Saints speak of one another—and they came about him to shake hands, or it might be to seize the opportunity of slipping a trifle into his hand to help him in his work. Young and old, the poor and the more wealthy neighbors, mingled together like one happy family. It was, altogether, a most pleasing scene; and, whatever explanation may yet be given of Mormonism in America, one thing I know—the facts of its early history in Europe are among the most pleasant reminiscences of my life.

Elder Stenhouse came up in a familiar and open-hearted way to my mother and sisters, and I was introduced to him as "the other daughter from France." He kindly welcomed me, and when I frankly told him the state of my mind, he made, I must admit, a successful attempt to solve my doubts, and when I left the meeting it was with sentiments towards the Saints and their religion far different from those which I entertained when I entered. The meeting was a memorable era in my life.

RUTH'S CHOICE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for December 23. Ruth 1 : 16-22. Golden Text, Ruth 1 : 16.

Elimelech's Worldly Prudence—Argued a Lack of Faith—Led to his Sons' Marrying Illegally—A Series of Calamities—Naomi's Wise Decision—What Ruth's Choice Appeared to Involve—Prepared for Sacrifices—The Journey of the Two Widows — Ruth's Introduction to her Future Husband—A Significant Greeting—Boaz Blessing Her—The Nearer Kinsman.

THE history of the times of the Judges is one long record of sin and judgment. At this time there was a famine in the land. In most countries a famine is looked upon as an inevitable misfortune, and men do the best they can to save themselves from its consequences. It was with this intention that Elimelech of Bethlehem-Judah took his family and went to sojourn in the land of Moab. A very wise move, some would say; but was God saying nothing through this famine? and had Elimelech no direction from Him how to act? God had declared, "If ye will not hearken unto Me, and will not do all these commandments . . . they shall deliver your bread again by weight: and ye shall eat and not be satisfied." (Lev. 26 : 14, 26.) And this is His direction to His people: "Trust in the Lord and do good; dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." (Ps. 37 : 3.) Elimelech had not confidence enough in God to trust Him. Oh how truly he that findeth or saveth his life shall lose it! (Matt. 10 : 39.) Elimelech died, and his two sons also. But before their death, Mahlon and Chilion, Elimelech's sons, had married wives of Moab. This was not pleasing to God. (Neh. 13 : 23-28.) Now only Naomi was left, with her two daughters-in-law.

Ever since the family had left the land of promise, things had gone ill with them; but Naomi now determined to return, and she exhorted her daughters-in-law to return to their own families, and wait until they had another chance of settling in life.

Orpah was quite ready to do this. The life of widowhood was distasteful to her, and, though with regret, she kissed her mother-in-law, and went her way. Naomi then appealed to Ruth, "Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back unto her people and her gods: return thou after thy sister-in-law."

After Her Gods—

this was the point. Far as the family had fallen in their unbelief in God for temporal supplies, they still worshipped the God of Israel, and no doubt the ready ears and heart of Ruth had drunk in the blessed truth which Naomi had taught them, of the power and love and personal intervention of the God of Israel. She counted the cost. To follow Naomi she must give up all her friends in Moab, she must go out penniless into a strange land, and, humanly speaking, she must sacrifice all her prospects in life. On the other hand, if the God of Israel were indeed the only true God, if He did rain down bread from heaven to satisfy his people's need, if He did make a way in the sea for His people to pass over—what had she to fear in going anywhere with such a God? She made her choice, and said to Naomi as she clung to her, "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee, for whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge. (As though to say, anything that will do for thee, will do for me, so long as God is with us.) Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." Thy God shall be my God; this was the main point. Homeless or with a home, penniless or not, she would take her part with God and with God's people.

This Was a True Conversion.

Oh how many there are who choose God so far as He ministers to their own will! They like the knowledge of sin forgiven, but they like the praise of men too. They like to indulge themselves in smoking, candies, or novel-reading, dress, ornaments, or in gossip over the tea-table with a neighbor, and yet make use of Christ's salvation to keep a claim on heaven. In fact, they want Christ, and Christ's religion, to minister to their own selfishness, so that they can be selfish with an easy conscience because their past sins are forgiven. But in Ruth's choice there was no selfishness. She was prepared to sacrifice all; her thought was not to get, but to give. She had mastered the true relations between God and man, and she saw that God does not exist for man's sake, but man exists for God. And thus the question with her was, not what it would cost her, and how far it would suit her to follow Naomi: it was the way to serve God; and she renounced forever the life of serving herself. Elimelech set out to serve himself, and loss and death were the consequence. Ruth set out to deny herself, and serve God, and joy and union were the result.

When Naomi saw that she was steadfastly minded, she left off dissuading her. So the two widows journeyed together to Bethlehem.

Absence from the Land of Promise had worked a great change in Naomi; just such a change as comes upon all who go astray from complete dependence upon God. "I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty." I went out, the Lord brought me home; this is the backslider's history.

It was barley-harvest, and a woman of Ruth's character would not degrade herself by living on the charity of others; "Let me now go to the field and glean," was her petition to Naomi. God guided her steps, and she began her work in a field belonging to Boaz, a rich relation of her deceased father-in-law. Her first introduction to her future husband was when he entered the field with his morning greeting to the reapers, "The Lord be with you!" and she heard their response, "The Lord bless thee!" Oh what a revolution it would work in all the factories, shipyards, iron-works, &c., if such a greeting were to take place daily between master and men! How could there be oppression, how could there be strikes, if there were oneness in the Lord? But taking Boaz as the type of the heavenly bridegroom, oh how precious to know that day by day He greets His reapers with His blessing.

Boaz noticed Ruth, and spoke to her, telling her not to go to another field, and to share the refreshments provided for the reapers. Ruth was astonished, and fell on her face and said; "Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou takest knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?" And Boaz answered: "It hath fully been shewed me all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law since the death of thine husband, and now thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not.

The Lord Recompense

thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust." Boaz recognized Ruth's true conversion to God, and, for God's sake, shewed kindness to her. She was beginning to reap what she had sown, and to find how faithful God is to them who trust in Him. It is no risk to trust God when we have a promise to go upon. Anxiety in Christians is as much as to say that God is not equal to bear our burdens when they are cast upon Him, and that He does not really care for us, although His Word declares He does. Boaz also provided that Ruth should share the mid-day meal with his laborers, and gave orders that some of the ears should be scattered on purpose for her. The fruit of her day's work, when she had beaten out the wheat, was about an ephah, i. e., about seven and a half gallons of wheat. This would support her mother-in-law and herself for some weeks.

On her return home, Naomi inquired of her where she had gleaned, and when she learned it was on the field belonging to Boaz, she recognized the hand of the Lord, and said, "Blessed be he of the Lord who hath not left off His kindness to the living and to the dead!" And telling Ruth that Boaz was a near kinsman, she advised her to keep fast by his maidens until the end of harvest. So Ruth went on steadily at work, gleaning every day for their support. But the harvest-home came at last, and the gleaning was over. Then it was that Naomi explained to her the law of Israel, how a brother's or next kinsman's, duty was to take the widow of a childless kinsman, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance; and then she directed Ruth to claim her right by the law of Israel. Ruth did so, and Boaz recognized her claim, but at the same time he said, "There is

than I." Christ gave Himself for His Church, and gave Himself for it "that He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing." (Eph. 5 : 25-27.) Union with Him is "the hope of our calling, the glory of our inheritance, the goal of our life." But before we can be united to Him, it must be found whether there is a kinsman nearer. Is Christ really first with us in everything, or is there a kinsman nearer? Self-interest ruined Elimelech, and self is at the root of many sins. It is self which hinders real abiding union with Jesus. Boaz undertook to deal with the kinsman. None but Christ can deal with self. Boaz sat in the gate of Bethlehem and watched for the kinsman, and there, in the presence of ten of the elders of the city, he stated how Naomi sold a parcel of land belonging to Elimelech; and offered him the first refusal, and the kinsman accepted the offer, and said, "I will redeem it." Then Boaz said, "What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of the hand of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead on his inheritance." And now the kinsman drew back; he was ready to buy the field, to make a good business investment, and "add house to house, and field to field"; but he was not ready to sacrifice his interests for another, and so he replied, "I cannot redeem it redeem thou my right thyself, for I cannot redeem it." It was self-interest again. But Boaz did the unselfish thing, and turning to the elders, he called upon them to witness that he bought the land, and with it Ruth the Moabitess, "to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place." The blessing of the elders was their only answer. Thus Boaz took Ruth and married her; and so she, who had left all for God, found Him faithful to her; and God gave her a child, who was the grandfather of David, and the progenitor of Christ.

Lest I Mar Mine Own Inheritance;

A CALL TO THE WEARY.

BY R. M. OFFORD.

Come, ye weary, do not tarry,
Bring to Jesus all your grief;
Why your burden longer carry
Since he offers sure relief?
Heavy-laden, sin distrest,
Come to Jesus Christ and rest.

Have you tried all worldly pleasure,
Sounded all the depths of sin,
Found no joy in earth's best treasure,
Seek you other joy to win?
Come to Jesus, He imparts
Lasting joy to joyless hearts.

On His lips is no upbraiding,
Though from God thou far hast strayed,
Though thy life's brief light is fading,
Sad the record thou hast made.
Come and welcome, do not wait,
Late it is, yet not too late.

Vile and most unworthy feeling,
'Twas for such His life He gave;
Bring thy wounded heart for healing,
If not lost how could He save?
Hast thou sinned beyond compare?
Greater need His grace to share.

ALEXANDER III., EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

HE WRECKED RAILROAD TRAIN FROM WHICH THE CZAR AND HIS FAMILY ESCAPED.

THE CZAR IN A RAILROAD DISASTER.

With the tardiness with which Russian news circulates through that empire and eventually reaches the outside world, a full report of the almost miraculous escape of the Czar from a disaster on the railroad on October 29, has arrived to supplement the vague telegraphic account published at the end of last month. It now appears that the Imperial family were returning to the capital from their visit to the Sea of Azov, and when the train by which they travelled reached Borki, in South Russia, it left the tracks at a sharp curve and fell into utter ruins. The dining-saloon car, in which the Czar and Czarina were seated at table at the time, was reduced to fragments, and how they escaped death is marvellous. The of the disaster have been published. One correspondent says: "The last three carriages were still on the rails, but the fourth was driven sideways, and overhung a steep incline of some forty feet or more. Beyond we saw nothing but a second-class carriage in fragments halfway down the hill, a number of bodies covered up, and broken timbers, planks, and a general wreck on the bankside. On proceeding further we saw the full effect of the disaster. The first carriage beyond the one I have mentioned had disappeared entirely; it was one mass of splinters tossed up in every conceivable direction, and the roof lying crosswise on the crushed woodwork; beyond was another carriage wrecked, but still partly standing, and then were some carriages leaning to the right, some to the left, some completely down, and two next the two engines still apparently little damaged. It was out of the crushed woodwork of the one most completely ruined that three-and-twenty living souls were rescued, with one or two exceptions, almost unbruised. It was the dining-saloon, and there their Imperial Majesties, with every child of theirs, save the little Grand Duchess Olga, were seated with the suite at dinner. A sudden shock sent them all down on the floor; a second, and the sides of the carriage were down on them, the roof across the whole; a third, and a dead stop—a terrible silence, broken by the shrieks of the dying and the wounded.

"Those who were there told me there was neither time to think, nor even to feel; their wounds and bruises they discovered afterwards. One gentleman told me he only found that he had lost half his finger an hour later. The Empress was one of the first to extricate herself from the wreck, crying:

'Where is the Emperor and my children?' The Empress's right hand was badly bruised, and the left slightly cut about, but she went at once to tend the wounded as they were extricated from the wreck. For nearly four hours she sat in the drizzling rain, on that sopping bank, binding up their wounds, or soothing them with words healing as the balm of Gilead. One poor fellow lay there mortally hurt, with his face fearfully scalded, and she sat by him, cooling his face with her handkerchief dipped in water, and the poor fellow died, kissing her hand.

"His Majesty and the Grand Dukes Nicholas and George Alexandrovitch were everywhere lending a helping hand, extricating the wounded and the dead. I heard nothing but blessings showered upon them wherever I went.

"A dog—Kamtchatka, the Czar's favorite hound—was lying at his feet when the accident occurred; a servant was presenting to him a tray with a glass of tea. How near the Czar was to death may be inferred from the fact that both the servant and the dog were killed instantaneously. It was a moment of sudden and appalling horror. Under the feet of the whole Imperial party, seated around the dining-table, the floor sinks, the whole bottom of the carriage disappears. The four walls are crushed together in the sudden smash; the unsupported roof gives way, and is prevented from falling on the heads of the Empress and the august children only by the powerful arms of the Emperor, who for several minutes supports it alone above the heads of his family. The little Grand Duchess Olga is thrown out to a distance of 10 sagen (60 feet) down the embankment; the little Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch is buried under the ruined carriages so deep that he could hardly be discovered, and then dug out and rescued from under the débris with the greatest difficulty—and both children are perfectly safe and unhurt! The Grand Duke George (the second son) finds himself squeezed between two seats, and at the same moment a heavy iron bar is descending on his head; but a second—just one second—earlier, a heavy brass frame falling on to the same seats, is found vertically dovetailing into the two, leaving a recess just large enough to contain and protect his body; and, meanwhile, Count Tcheremetieff arrests the heavy bar in its fall, which almost tears three fingers off his hand, but George remains uninjured.

The Czar's Injuries.

"In a pouring rain, knee-deep in the cold mud, bleeding from both arms and hands (the bandages were only removed on November 3), and he helping personally to rescue the dying and the wounded for over two hours, his colossal strength doing him goodly service on that day. They tell how he spoke words of consolation to those sufferers still alive, pledging his word to the dying to care for their families as long as they lived.

Some carriages preceded the two engines, which were placed together in the middle of the train. One of the engines, decorated with branches of trees and wreaths of foliage, is seen in the picture on the front page, thrown off the rails, with an engine tender behind it. There is no doubt that the rails, which were in bad repair, gave way under the excessive speed at which the train was driven.

THE CZAR AND CZARINA.

Early Days of the Czar—Affiliation with Secret Societies—His Separation on Discovering their Murderous Intentions—Personal Characteristics—Accession to the Throne—Effect of his Marriage—Character of the Czarina—Visits to Copenhagen—Difficulties of Government—Remarkable Answer of a Peasant—The Only Hope for Russia.

The ruler of the mighty empire of Russia, whose portrait, with that of his wife, appears on the first page, is in his forty-fourth year, having been born March 10, 1845. He is the second son of the late Emperor Alexander II. His elder brother, Nicholas, who was a year and a half older than he, died in April, 1865, and Alexander then became heir to the throne. He became Czar in 1881, on the assassination of his father by the Nihilists on March 14, of that year. Alexander, like some other Crown Princes, allied himself during the lifetime of his father to the most progressive party in politics, and is believed to have coquetted as lately as 1878 with the more advanced Panslavistic organizations, which were acting in concert with, though not openly allied to, the associations formed for the promotion of a revolutionary movement in Russia. Upon more than one occasion the Grand Duke's relations with native patriots of the advanced Panslavistic school are stated to have led to distressing differences between himself and his father, to whom, moreover, his son's avowed antipathy to Germany was particularly painful.

When, however, it became evident, not only to the Imperial family, but to the public, that the chief aim of the Nihilistic conspiracy was the assassination of the Czar, his son, the present Emperor, broke off all connections with every description of secret society in and out of Russia, and identified himself unreservedly with the line of action adopted by his father's advisers for the perpetuation of the Romanoff dynasty.

The Emperor is said to be a strong, determined man, though his nerves have been severely shaken by the continual peril of assassination in which the years of his life since his accession to the throne have been passed. His face has none of that pathetic melancholy peculiar to his father's. His expression is active, keen, and somewhat severe. His manners are quick, decided, and occasionally brusque. He is not quite so tall as other members of his family, being a little under six feet in height, but his frame is large, thickset, and muscular. An American press correspondent who saw him recently, says: "That the Czar has been no carpet soldier is evident from the marks of frost-bites on the third and fourth fingers of his left hand, and a slight scar on his temple, where a bullet grazed his head in the Turkish war."

The Coronation

of the Czar did not take place until May 27, 1883. The delay was due to several causes, the chief of which, doubtless, was the activity of the Nihilists, who, finding that the new Czar was utterly alienated by the murder of his father from the progressive associations to which he had been friendly in his younger days, and was firmly opposed to granting a constitution, had resolved to kill him too. The large assemblage of illustrious personages, which would be gathered from all nations to witness the ceremony, would present an opportunity for a wholesale slaughter by dynamite, and time was needed to take the most complete precautions against such an event. The coronation was, however, performed safely, though more than one of the Princes who attended admitted afterward that the day was one of fear and trembling.

The Czar's Habits

show a marked improvement on those of his early days. His marriage was the turning-point in his career, for the good and gentle princess who became his wife exerted so complete an ascendency over him, that he withdrew from his evil associates and devoted himself to studies which were a preparation for the responsible career before him. His study in the Anitchkov Palace is a small room fitted up with maps and globes and well-filled bookcases, in which historical works in all languages predominate. That he is a reader is shown by the pile of newspapers which he collects at the different stations when on a railroad journey to peruse on the road, and he has taken personal interest in the publication of the State correspondence in Russia. The Czar is an early riser, and the labors of his day commence at 9 in the morning. Till 1 o'clock he is occupied in his study receiving the Ministers, who present their weekly or daily reports, and consulting with them over affairs of State.

It is especially significant of the policy of the Czar that while high officials have often a difficulty in obtaining an interview, His Majesty is always accessible to provincial deputations, which are sometimes composed of wild Khirgis, sometimes of swarthy Kalmuks, or skin-clad Samoyedes, and sometimes of illiterate Russian peasants who desire to present a holy picture to their great father and to express their loyalty and devotion to his person. The Emperor receives one and all with a stern dignity, which, though accompanied in most cases by a certain kindness of manner, always leaves the conviction that Alexander III. feels himself an autocrat, and is determined to yield none of his prerogatives, but to impress on all who approach him that they are in the presence of an absolute though kindly master. This species of self-assertion was a trait in the character of the Emperor in his very earliest days.

The Danish Princess, who is the wife of the Czar, is a daughter of King Christian of Denmark, and the sister of the Princess of Wales, and of the King of Greece. She was originally betrothed to Nicholas, the elder brother of the Czar, but when he died, the Russian statesmen and the late Czar were so anxious to break the succession of German matrimonial alliances which had been continued since the time of the Czar Peter, that they commenced negotiations at once for the transfer of the Princess Dagmar to the new heir to the Imperial throne. The negotiations were successful, and in November 1866, the Princess became the wife of Alexander.

An American gentleman who recently spent some months in St. Petersburg, says: "The Empress is as much liked in Russia as her sister, the Princess of Wales, is in England. The two sisters resemble each other, not only in looks, but in sweetness of character. Alexander's domestic life has hitherto been pure and wonderfully happy, and unless something happens to mar this, we may look for a considerable improvement over the period of the late Czar in the ideas of the court on the subject of morals. The Czarina has five beautiful children—the eldest, Nicholas, a fine youth of seventeen; the second, George, about fourteen, who bears a striking resemblance to the early pictures of Alexander II., and three much younger ones. Xenia, Michael, and Olga. She has accompanied her husband to all parts of European Russia, and has gained the affection of the people, particularly of the Poles. In the winter, at the Anitchkov Palace, she has an annual Christmas free, but it is not invariably the children of the nobles who are invited, but a number from the most squalid homes in St. Petersburg, recommended by some of the members of the Society for the Relief of Distress, and these are always sent away with a good stock of warm clothing.

Visits to Copenhagen,

the home of the Empress are among the most pleasant recreations of the Imperial couple. There the Czar devotes himself to his family, and lays aside for a time the cares of his vast Empire of more than a hundred million souls. He is popular in the Danish capital, where he and the Princess Dagmar, as she is still fondly called by the Danes, walk about the town together in the most unceremonious manner, and are always ready to take their part in any popular entertainment during the time they stay at her father's court. It also speaks well for him that he is supposed to require no extra amusement there, but to be perfectly happy, leading a simple life with his wife and children.

It is asserted by those who know the Czar, that he is far less averse to granting a constitution than were his predecessors. His difficulty lies chiefly in the determined opposition of the nobles, on whom he would have to rely for the conduct of the Government. They would probably conspire against him on the first intimation of constitutional tendencies; or if they refrained from that course, might give him so half hearted a support as to thwart his intentions. The Government continues a pure despotism: but the hopes of the people are not yet utterly abandoned. Their longing was pathetically expressed by a condemned prisoner to the Czar himself. He was only a peasant, but he had been condemned to death for a share in a conspiracy: "I have the power to pardon you," said the Czar, "and I would do so if I thought you would become a faithful subject." "Sire," said the condemned man, whose name was Michael Bestoujif, "that is our great misfortune, that the Emperor can do everything, and that there is no law!"

The only real hope for Russia lies, however, in the fact that now, as never before, efforts are being made to spread the knowledge of the gospel throughout the vast land, and to emancipate the people from the superstitions of the Greek Church. Through the distribution of the Scriptures, and earnest evangelistic efforts on the part of men like Lord Radstock and M. Pashkhoff, there is a quiet growth and deepening of spiritual life, at least in Northern Russia, and an increased attention to the Word of God. Colportage also is being favored with an increasing measure of success. The people are, however, densely ignorant, and there is need for prayer by all who offer the petition "Thy kingdom come," that not only the rulers of that mighty empire (the Emperor and Empress) themselves, may know Christ the King of kings as their Saviour, but that the millions of their subjects may be led into the light of that glorious Gospel which is the true charter of man's highest freedom, and "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Shutting One's Eyes to the Disease.—"When I was preaching once at Motherwell," said Mr. Climie, "a woman came to me and asked if I would speak to her husband about his soul. I promised to do so, and on the following day, as I was going to her house, I met her coming up the street. 'Are you going to see my husband?' she asked. When she heard that I was, she said, 'Well, please do not speak to him about sin.' 'Why not?' I inquired. 'Oh, he can't stand that,' she replied. 'But,' I said, 'I cannot do him any good, nor offer him salvation, unless the man knows and acknowledges that he is a sinner. Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' Simple though it was, the woman seemed scarcely to understand the plan of salvation herself. She turned with me to the house, and there, not long afterwards, both husband and wife acknowledged themselves sinners, and sought forgiveness at the hand of a loving Father."

A Coolie's Loyalty to Christ.—The Rev. J. Backus writes from Ceylon: "One of our converts, who was employed on an estate managed by a heathen, was known among his comrades to be a Christian. When the manager insisted one day on his going, with other coolies, to the neighbouring heathen temple, the poor man said, 'No, sir, I will not go to worship an idol. I am a Christian, and I worship the only true God.' When the manager threatened to turn him off the estate, he boldly said, 'I would rather beg than worship idols. My bread is not in your hands, but in the hands of Him whom I worship. Although you turn me out, He will never forsake me.' He was immediately turned out, but the Lord has provided for him, and he is doing an exceedingly good business as a trader, and is known far and wide for his unfailing joy, and the earnest desire which constrains him to lead his fellow-men to the Lord Jesus Christ."

Preaching Christ at the Hunters' Camp-fires.—Mr. Stevenson, of the Bethel Santhal Mission, observes: "The Santhals are demon-worshippers, and are difficult to influence for good. I have often overtaken a man on the road and talked to him of his country and of local traditions; then gliding on to his hope for the future, pointed out to him the striking contrast between the demons whom he worships from fear, and our God who endured pain and died for His followers. Often by this comparison many wandering ones have been brought to Christ. We secure the largest and most attentive audiences at the hunting-parties, while they are around their camp-fires, for often a whole village will assemble, and armed with axes, set out for a grand hunt. While there assembled, we preach the Gospel to them, frequently illustrating what we say by the magic-lantern. Their general excuse for not accepting Christ is, 'I'll become a Christian when my friends become Christians.' None like to take the initiative, so while many may be convinced of sin, few acknowledge Christ as their Saviour, yet often we have had blessed times at those hunt meetings, and Christ has been accepted by some."

Riding Out a Perilous Storm.—Dr. Kneeland said: "A merchant vessel in the Mediterranean Sea was overtaken lately by a great storm. So violent was the tempest that even the oldest sailor confessed that he had never seen such a gale, even in these stormy parts. Before they could make much headway to the nearest port, they found themselves drifted so near the rocks, and the wind and waves so beating them toward the inhospitable shore, that they knew their only hope was to cast anchor; and if it held until the morning, they knew they would be saved. The sailors got the largest and heaviest anchor, with a great massive chain, and threw it overboard. It held only for a moment, then the chain parted, and the helpless ship drifted on. Another and another anchor was cast, but none held, and now they were very near to the rocks. There remained only one anchor—a comparatively small one. This they prepared to let go, praying the while that God would make it hold. One man interrupted, saying, 'What is the use of that little thing? Leave it, and let us ask the forgiveness of our sins, and make peace with God.' But the captain replied, 'Stand by the anchor; I know the man who made the chain; and everything he did was of the best. Every link in that chain can be depended upon.' They let go the anchor, and waited in breathless silence. It caught, and the vessel was enabled to ride out the storm. Christ is the only true Anchor that will enable us to ride out the storms of life. Other anchors there are which men trust, but which, in the time of need, fail them."

The Silver Lining to the Cloud.—Mr. Ralston, the evangelist, observed: "I stood, a little time ago, by the bedside of a Christian worker as he lay dying, and tried to comfort his wife. While speaking to her, she suddenly interrupted me with, 'Do you know, Mr. Ralston, at one time I determined never to go back to your meeting, because you speak as a man who has never known what it is to have any great trouble.' 'How did you come to think so?' I responded. 'Because I have heard you say things that seem to show that life has been very smooth with you,' she said. 'Well, you are mistaken,' I replied; 'I do know what it is to have trouble, but I also know what it is to have a God who takes it all away, and bears it for me.' 'But,' she continued, 'my husband lies there, dying; and here am I, and my five little children, about to be left helpless. Does the future not look black?' 'Do you think that God ever makes a mistake?' I asked. 'Oh, no!' she replied. 'Then all this trouble, no matter what it appears, is for your good, for "All things work together for good to them that love God."' 'Yes,' she replied, 'it must be for my good; but I never looked at it in that way before.' We are so apt to look only at the black side of the cloud, and forget altogether the silver lining, namely, God's loving purpose that He has in view, and which He could not attain without the strokes of what we call affliction."

A Basket With a Baby in It.—Mr. Grey Relates: "A wealthy merchant living in one of the suburbs of New York, coming down-stairs one morning, found a large basket addressed to him. On opening it, to the surprise of himself and his wife, they found in it a little baby. The merchant said, 'We will keep it to-day and to-morrow, then I will take it to such an institution and leave it there.' 'Can we not keep it?' 'Yes; if all the family agree, we will keep it,' her husband answered. All the family did agree, and the waif was formally installed as if she were naturally one of themselves. The child grew, and was sent to school with the others, and on one occasion she quarrelled with a companion there, a little girl belonging to a family who lived in the same street, and who knew all about the adoption and the attendant circumstances. 'And what are you?' said the one; 'nothing but an adopted brat!' She did not know the meaning of these words, but she inquired and found their meaning; then running home, she threw herself into her adopted mother's arms, and gave vent to a great burst of tears. Her mother, astonished at her behavior, asked what was the matter, only to be confronted with the startling question, 'Are you my mother?' 'Yes my child,' was the answer. 'But are you my real, true mother?' persisted the child, still dissatisfied. The lady could not say that she was. Nothing that generous lady or gentleman could do could make that child their natural daughter. But the sinner, when he comes to God, becomes the real, true son of God; and heir by birth, being born of the Holy Spirit into sonship and heirship of God."

LIFTED FROM THE MIRE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday, December 16, 1888.

"Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." Ps. 68 : 13.

The Israelites among the Brick-kilns—Doves on Egyptian Houses—The Hardest of all Taskmasters—Hume's Admission—Christians Pitied Instead of being Congratulated—I. What Religion can Do for a Man's Heart—Becomes more Cheerful—Laughter that is Hollow—The Memory of a Mother's Last Look—II. Religion Bringing Usefulness—Two Young Men—Three Spectacles—A Dying Student of Providence College—III. What Religion Does for Him in Heaven—Friends Waiting—The Fall of Louis Philippe.

I SUPPOSE you know what the Israelites did down in Egyptian slavery. They made bricks. Amid the utensils of the brick-kiln there were also other utensils of cookery—the kettles, the pots, the pans, with which they prepared their daily food ; and when these poor slaves, tired of the day's work, lay down to rest, they lay down among the implements of cookery and the implements of hard work. When they arose in the morning they found their garments covered with the clay and the smoke and the dust, and with the utensils of cookery. But after a while the Lord broke up that slavery, and He took these poor slaves into a land where they had better garb, bright and clean and beautiful apparel. No more bricks for them to make. Let Pharaoh make his own bricks. When David, in my text, comes to describe the transition of these poor Israelites from their bondage amid the brick-kilns into the glorious emancipation for which God had prepared them, he says: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

Miss Whately, the author of a celebrated book, "Life in Egypt," said she sometimes saw people in the East cooking their food on the tops of houses, and that she had often seen, just before sundown, pigeons and doves, which had, during the heat of the day, been hiding among the kettles and the pans with which the food was prepared, picking up the crumbs that they might find: just about the hour of sunset they would spread their wings and fly heavenward, entirely unsoiled by the region in which they had moved, for the pigeon is a very cleanly bird. And as the pigeons flew away the setting sun would throw silver on their wings and gold on their breasts. So you see it was not a far-fetched simile, or an unnatural comparison, when David in my text says to these emancipated Israelites, and says to all those who are brought out of any kind of trouble into any kind of spiritual joy: "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

Sin is the hardest of all taskmasters. Worse than Pharaoh, it keeps us drudging, drudging in but after a while Christ comes, and He says: "Let my people go," and we pass out from among the brick-kilns of sin into the glorious liberty of the Gospel: we put on the clean robes of a Christian profession, and when, at last, we soar away to the warm nest which God has provided for us in heaven, we shall go fairer than a dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers covered with yellow gold.

I am going to preach something which some of you do not believe, and that is, that the grandest possible adornment is the religion of Jesus Christ. There are a great many people who suppose that religion is a very different thing from what it really is. The reason men condemn the Bible is because they do not understand the Bible; they have not properly examined it. Dr. Johnson said that Hume told a minister in the bishopric of Durham, that he had never particularly examined the New Testament, yet all his life warring against it. Halley the astronomer, announced his scepticism to Sir Isaac Newton, and Sir Isaac Newton said: "Now, sir, I have examined the subject and you have not; and I am ashamed that you, professing to be a philosopher, consent to condemn a thing you never have examined." And so men reject the religion of Jesus Christ because they really have never investigated it. They think it something undesirable, something that will not work, something Pecksniffian, something hypocritical, something repulsive, when it is so bright and so beautiful you might compare it to chaffinch, you might compare it to a robin-redbreast, you might compare it to a dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with yellow gold.

Wasted Pity.

But how is it if a young man becomes a Christian? All through the club-rooms where he associates, all through the business circles where he is known, there is commiseration. They say: "What a pity that a young man who had such bright prospects should so have been despoiled by those Christians, giving up all his worldly prospects for something which is of no particular present worth!" Here is a young woman who becomes a Christian ; her voice, her face, her manners the charm of the drawing-room. Now all through the fashionable circles the whisper goes : "What a pity that such a bright light should have been extinguished, that such a graceful gait should be crippled, that such worldly prospects should be obliterated!" Ah, my friends, it can be shown that religion's ways are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are peace; that religion, instead of being dark and doleful and lachrymose and repulsive, is bright and beautiful, fairer than a dove, its wings covered with silver and its feathers with yellow gold.

See, in the first place, what religion will do for a man's heart. I care not how cheerful a man may naturally be before conversion, to a higher standard of cheerfulness. I do not say he will laugh any louder; I do not say but he may stand back from some forms of hilarity in which he once indulged; but there comes into his soul an immense satisfaction. A young man not a Christian depends upon worldly successes to keep his spirits up. Now he is prospered, now he has a large salary, now he has a beautiful wardrobe, now he has pleasant friends, now he has more money than he knows how to spend ; everything goes bright and well with him. But trouble comes—there are many young men in the house this morning who can testify out of their own experience that sometimes to young men trouble does come—his friends are gone, his salary is gone, his health is gone ; he goes down, down. He becomes sour, cross, queer, misanthropic, blames the world, blames society, blames the Church, blames everything, rushes perhaps to the intoxicating cup to drown his trouble, but, instead of drowning his trouble, he drowns his body and drowns his soul.

Conversion Brings Him Up

But here is a Christian young man. Trouble comes to him. Does he give up? No! He throws himself back on the resources of heaven. He says: "God is my Father. Out of all these disasters I shall pluck advantage for my soul. All the promises are mine, Christ is mine, Christian companionship is mine, heaven is mine. What though my apparel be worn out? Christ gives me a robe of righteousness. What though my money be gone? I have in the promise, 'All are yours.' What though my worldly friends fall away? Ministering angels are my bodyguard. What though my fare be poor, and my bread be scant? I sit at the King's banquet!"

Oh, what a poor, shallow stream is worldly enjoyment compared with the deep, broad, overflowing river of God's peace, rolling midway in the Christian heart! Sometimes you have gone out on the iron-bound beach of the sea when there has been a storm on the ocean, and you have seen the waves dash into white foam at your feet. They did not do you any harm. While there, you thought of the chapter written by the Psalmist, and perhaps you recited it to yourself while the storm was making commentary upon the passage: "God is our

a very present help in time of trouble. Therefore will I not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea, though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." Oh, how independent the religion of Christ makes a man of worldly success and worldly circumstances! Nelson, the night before his last battle, said : "To-morrow I shall win either a peerage, or a grave in Westminster Abbey." And it does not make much difference to the Christian whether he rises or falls in worldly matters : he has everlasting renown anyway. Other plumage may be torn in the blast, but that soul adorned with Christian grace, is fairer than the dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with gold.

You and I have found out that people who pretend to be happy are not always happy. Look at that young man caricaturing the Christian religion, scoffing at everything good, going into roystering drunkenness, dashing the champagne bottle to the floor, rolling the glasses from the bar-room counter, laughing, shouting, stamping the floor. Is he happy? I will go to

His Midnight Pillow.

I will see him turn the gas off. I will ask myself if the pillow on which he sleeps is as soft as the pillow on which that pure young man sleeps. Ah! no. When he opens his eyes in the morning, will the world be as bright to him as to that young man who retired at night saying his prayers, invoking God's blessing upon his own soul and the souls of his comrades, and father and mother and brother and sister far away? No, no! His laughter will ring out from the saloon so that you hear it as you pass by, but it is hollow laughter; in it is the snapping of heart-strings and the rattle of prison gates. Happy! that young man happy?

Let him fill high the bowl; he cannot drown an upbraiding conscience. Let the balls roll through the bowling alley; the deep rumble and the sharp crack cannot overpower the voices of condemnation. Let him whirl in the dance of sin and temptation and death. All the brilliancy of the scene cannot make him forget the last look of his mother as he left home, when she said to him: "Now, my son, you will do right; I am sure you will do right; you will, won't you?" That young man happy? Why, across every night there flit shadows of eternal darkness; there are adders coiled up in every cup; there are vultures of despair striking their iron beak into his heart; there are skeleton fingers of grief pinching at the throat.

I come in amid the clicking of the glasses and under the flashing of the chandeliers, and I cry: "Woe! woe! The way of the ungodly shall perish. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. The way of transgressors is hard." Oh, my friends, there is more joy in one drop of Christian satisfaction than in whole rivers of sinful delight. Other wings may be drenched of the storm and splashed of the tempest, but the dove that comes in through the window of this heavenly ark has wings like the dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

Again I remark, religion is an adornment in the style of usefulness into which it inducts a man. Here are

Two Young Men.

The one has fine culture, exquisite wardrobe, plenty of friends, great worldly success, but he lives for himself. His chief care is for his own comfort. He lives uselessly. He dies unregretted. Here is another young man. His apparel may not be so good, his education may not be so thorough. He lives for others. His happiness is to make others happy. He is as self-denying as that dying soldier falling in the ranks, when he said: "Colonel, there is no need of those boys tiring themselves by carrying me to the hospital; let me die just where

I am." So this young man of whom I speak loves God, wants all the world to love Him, is not ashamed to carry a bundle of clothes up that dark alley to the poor. Which of those young men do you admire the better? The one a sham, the other

A Prince Imperial.

Oh, do you know of anything, my hearer, that is more beautiful than to see a young man start out for Christ? Here is some one falling; he lifts him up. Here is a vagabond boy; he introduces him to a mission school. Here is a family freezing to death; he carries them a scuttle of coal. There are eight hundred millions perishing in midnight heathen darkness; by all possible means he tries to send to them the Gospel. He may be laughed at, and he may be sneered at, and he may be caricatured, but he is not ashamed to go everywhere, saying: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ. It is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation." Such a young man can go through everything. There is no force on earth or in hell that can resist him. I show you

Three Spectacles.

Spectacle the first: Napoleon passes by with the host that went down with him to Egypt, and up with him through Russia, and crossed the continent on the bleeding heart of which he set his iron heel, and across the quivering flesh of which he went grinding the wheels of his gun-carriages—in his dying moment asking his attendants to put on his military boots for him.

Spectacle the second: Voltaire, bright and learned and witty and eloquent, with tongue and voice and stratagem infernal, warring against God and poisoning whole kingdoms with his infidelity, yet applauded by the clapping hands of thrones and empires and continents—his last words, in delirium supposing Christ standing by the bedside—his last words: "Crush that wretch!"

Spectacle the third: Paul—Paul, insignificant in person, thrust out from all refined association, scourged, spat on, hounded like a wild beast from city to city, yet trying to make the world good and heaven full; to those who mourned at the barred gates of the dead; speaking consolations which light up the eyes of widowhood and orphanage and want with glow of certain and eternal release; undaunted before those who could take his life, his cheek flushed with transport, and his eye on heaven; with one hand shaking defiance at all the foes of earth and all the principalities of hell, and with the other hand beckoning messenger angels to come and bear him away, as he says: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give me."

Announcing Resurrection

Which of the three spectacles do you most admire? When struck the conqueror and the infidel, they were tossed like sea-gulls in a tempest, drenched of the wave and torn of the hurricane, their dismal voices heard through the everlasting storm; but when the wave and the wind of death struck Paul, like an albatross he made a throne of the tempest, and one day floated away into the calm, clear summer of heaven, brighter than the dove, its wings covered with silver, and its feathers with yellow gold. Oh, are you not in love with such a religion—a religion that can do so much for a man while he lives, and so much for a man when he comes to die?

I suppose you may have noticed the contrast between the departure of a Christian and the departure of an infidel. Diodorus, dying in chagrin because he could not compose a joke equal to the joke uttered at the other end of his table; Zeuxis, dying in a fit of laughter at the sketch of an aged woman—a sketch made by his own hand; Mazarin, dying playing cards, his friend holding his hands because he was unable to hold them himself. All that on one side, compared with the departure of the Scotch minister, who said to his friends: "I have no interest as to whether I live or die; if I die, I shall be with the Lord; and if I live, the Lord shall be with me." Or the last words of Washington: "It is well." Or the last words of McIntosh, the learned and the great: "Happy!" Or the last word of Hannah More, the Christian poetess: "Joy!" Or those thousands of Christians who have gone, saying: "Lord Jesus receive my spirit! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!" "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?"

Behold the Contrast.

Behold the charm of the one, behold the darkness of the other. Now, I know it is very popular in this day for young men to think there is something more charming in scepticism than in religion. They are ashamed of the old-fashioned religion of the cross, and they pride themselves on their free-thinking on all these subjects. My young friends, I want to tell you what I know from observation: that while scepticism is a beautiful land at the start, it is the great Sahara Desert at the last.

Years ago a minister's son went off from home to college. At college he formed the acquaintance of a young man whom I shall call Ellison. Ellison was an infidel. Ellison scoffed at religion, and the minister's son soon learned from him the infidelity, and when he went home on his vacation broke his father's heart by his denunciations of Christianity. Time passed on and vacation came, and the minister's son went off to spend the vacation, and was on a journey, and came to a hotel. The hotel-keeper said: "I am sorry that to-night I shall have to put you in a room adjoining one where there is a very sick and dying man. I can give you no other accommodation." "Oh," said the young college student and minister's son, "that will make no difference to me except the matter of sympathy with anybody that is suffering." The young man retired to his room, but could not sleep. All night long he heard the groaning of the sick man, or the step of the watchers, and his soul trembled. He thought to himself: "Now, there is only a thin wall between me and a departing spirit. How if Ellison should know how I feel? How if Ellison should find out how my heart flutters? What if Ellison knew

My Scepticism Gave Way?"

He slept not. In the morning, coming down, he said to the hotel-keeper: "How is the sick man?" "Oh," said the hotel-keeper, "he is dead, poor fellow! the doctors told us he could not last through the night." "Well," said the young man, "what was the sick one's name; where is he from?" "Well," said the hotel-keeper, "he is from Providence College." "Providence College! what is his name?" "Ellison." "Ellison!" Oh, how the young man was stunned! It was his old college-mate—dead without any hope.

It was many hours before the young man could leave that hotel. He got on his horse and started homeward, and all the way he heard something saying to him:

"Dead! Lost! Dead!

Lost!" He came to no satisfaction until he entered the Christian life, until he entered the Christian ministry, until he became one of the most eminent missionaries of the Cross, the greatest Baptist missionary the world has ever seen since the days of Paul—no superior to Adoniram Judson. Mighty on earth, mighty in heaven—Adoniram Judson. Which do you like the best, Judson's scepticism or Judson's Christian life, Judson's suffering for Christ's sake, Judson's almost martyrdom? Oh, young man, take your choice between these two kinds of lives. Your own heart tells you this morning the Christian life is more admirable, more peaceful, more comfortable, and more beautiful.

Oh, if religion does so much for a man on earth, what will it do for him in heaven? That is the thought that comes to me now. If a soldier can afford to shout "Huzza!" when he goes into battle, how much more jubilantly he can afford to shout "Huzza!" when

He has Gained the Victory!

If religion is so good a thing to have here, how bright a thing it will be in heaven! I want to see that young man when the glories of heaven have robed and crowned him. I want to hear him sing when all huskiness of earthly colds is gone, and he rises up with the great doxology. I want to know what standard he will carry when marching under arches of pearl in the army of banners. I want to know what company he will keep in a land where they are all kings and queens forever and ever. If I have induced one of you this morning to begin a better life, then I want to know it. I may not in this world clasp hands with you in friendship, I may not hear from your own lips the story of temptation and sorrow, but I will clasp hands with you when the sea is passed and the gates are entered.

That I might woo you to a better life, and that I might show you the glories with which God clothes His dear children in heaven, I wish I could this morning swing back one of the twelve gates, that there might dash upon your ear one shout of the triumph, that there might flame upon your eyes one blaze of the splendor. Oh, when I speak of that good land, you involuntarily think of some one there that you loved—father, mother, brother, sister, or, dear little child garnered already. You want to know what they are doing this morning. I will tell you what they are doing. Singing! You want to know what they wear. I will tell you what they wear. Coronets of triumph! You wonder why oft they look to the gate of the temple, and watch and wait. I will tell you and look to the gate of the temple. For your coming! I shout upward the news to-day, for I am sure some of you will repent and start for heaven: "Oh, ye bright ones before the throne, your earthly friends are coming. Angels, posing mid-air, cry up the name! Gatekeeper of heaven, send forward the tidings! Watchman on the battlements celestial, throw the signal"!

"Oh," you say, "religion I am going to have; it is only a question of time." My brother, I am afraid that you may lose heaven the way Louis Philippe lost his empire. The Parisian mob came around the Tuileries. The National Guard stood in defence of the palace, and the commander said to Louis Philippe: "Shall I fire now? Shall I order the troops to fire? With one volley we can clear the place." "No," said Louis Philippe, "not yet." A few minutes passed on, and then Louis Philippe, seeing the case was hopeless, said to the general: "Now is the time to fire." "No," said the general, "it is too late now; don't you see that the soldiers are exchanging arms with the citizens? It is too late." Down went the throne of Louis Philippe. Away from the earth went the House of Orleans, and all because the king said: "Not yet! not yet!" May God forbid that any of you should adjourn this great subject of religion, and should postpone assailing your spiritual foes until it is too late, too late—you losing a throne in heaven the way that Louis Philippe lost a throne on earth.

"When the Judge descends in might,
Clothed in majesty and light;
When the earth shall quake with fear,
Where, oh where, wilt thou appear?"

IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

The following is an extract from a letter received last week from the Rev. W. F. Re Qua, whose work among the Indians is chiefly supported by the readers of The Christian Herald: We now have a mission school station opened among the full-blood Indians. With some help, the Indians have built a log-house, and a log school-house adjoining, so the teacher has a place to live. She came from Cohoes, N. Y., out of a good, comfortable home, believing the Lord led her into the work. Her people sent out her house-keeping goods, so she can board herself. Her brother came out, and has taken hold and helped the Indians, with myself, to finish up the buildings for the school purposes. Monday and Tuesday, this week, I helped them move out and settle; both are excellent Christians, and I believe the Lord has a good work for them out here. If I had others like them—devoted and consecrated, to offer themselves to the work—and means to assist the Indians in different parts of the country to build mission schools (log buildings), furnishing flooring, windows, and doors, we might in a year have a number of good working schools. The young lady who takes this mission station has a very kind father, who aids in her support. I am in hopes to furnish you with some good views of scenes in our work—perhaps a picture of the new mission station, and one of a curious cemetery, not far off in the woods, where the Indians inter their dead; each grave being covered with an odd little frame or log structure that looks like a little grotesque hut. I expect to stop in Tahlequah, the capital of the Cherokee Nation, on my return home from Fort Smith, Ark., and hold some meetings there, by urgent request, as I go within twenty-five miles of there, by mail, which distance has to be covered by stage. Then, on reaching home (D. V.), I shall start with tabernacle tent to the Sac and Fox tribe, about 175 miles by wagon. I believe there are more obstacles to contend with in this Territory than in a foreign field; but gradually we are overcoming them.

A CHINESE PATRIARCH'S PLEA.

Every one who knows Jesus as the Way, the Truth, and the Life—who has known by experience the truth of His words: "I am the Door: by Me if any man enter in he shall be saved" (John 10: 9.)—must feel an intense desire to respond to a desire expressed by an aged Chinese priest with whom Dr. Jonathan Lees had an interview in a temple. Dr. Lees thus related the incident at a public meeting:

"It is now more than twenty years since I travelled into the interior, a distance of over 1,000 miles, visiting a multitude of places where no foreigners had been before, and preaching in city, markets, town, and village, not only without serious hindrance, but often with the marked intelligent interest of the people. Such journeys have become frequent since, yet it is rarely that one hears of a different experience. Some present may have heard me relate a touching incident I met with on a shorter tour a few years ago. It was near the close of a winter afternoon, and my carter was pushing on to reach our halting-place for the night, when, on passing through a village my eye was suddenly caught by what was evidently an extemporized temple mat-shed. Though pressed for time, curiosity led me to enter. Yes, there was the idol—a large picture hanging at the end opposite to the door, and there was the familiar altar table, with its incensepot, candlesticks, and various offerings, while the sides of the enclosure were made gay with pictures. A few old men were at the moment the only visitors. As I stood there a man came to burn incense and to perform his prostrations. Then we talked. You can imagine it easily enough. They told me that their worship was to secure good crops. I spoke of the great loving Father in heaven who supplies all our wants, and then I spoke of Jesus. Rising to go, they begged me to retell the story, and when at length I must leave, sad at heart that we might almost certainly never meet again on earth, one old, whitehaired patriarch cried out: 'Oh, do stay and teach us. We did not know this was wrong. Our fathers worshipped thus; we cannot find the door.' Those words haunted me for days; they haunt me still."

A CRIPPLED CHRISTIAN'S TESTIMONY.

A young man having lost both limbs below the knee, while in Satan's service, is now an active Christian in Florida. In a recent letter to a missionary in New York, he says: "I am every day reminded of God's infinite mercy and goodness to me, and can never give Him praise and thanks enough. I have been to Tampa today, and was offered the charge of a property consisting of over 1,000 acres of land and six hundred head of cattle. They said some very kind things about my being trustworthy and capable, and all that, but I do not take any of the praise to myself, for I know it is all God's work. What would I be now, if by His mercy I had not been led to learn of the meek and lowly Jesus? I would be a drunkard, and maybe a convict in some prison. He has saved me, and I praise Him every day.

"You ask me how I can build a barn (having artificial limbs); I will tell you: 'I left it all with Jesus long ago,' and He leads me, and helps me to do everything. It is Jesus doing the work. He gives me strength, power, and ability to do what otherwise would be an utter impossibility. So I know it is Jesus who does the work."

THE INTEREST ON THIRTY CENTS.

As a lady missionary in New York was going down Cherry Street by the sailors' boarding-houses a few days ago, a bronzed sailor suddenly confronted her, and said abruptly, but respectfully, "Do you remember giving me thirty cents last March?" The lady did remember. He insisted on paying it back, and afterward accepted an invitation to the meeting for sailors at the Mission. At that meeting he rose and said, "I've got a big heart, but I can't express myself as I ought to. When I was in New York last March I had no place to sleep, and two nights I crawled into an ice-cart, and slept there. But I was very cold and hungry; oh I was so down! I was all broken. I didn't know nothing! If help hadn't come, I was going to cut my throat, or jump into the river. But you spoke kind to me, and you prayed for me, and gave me money for lodging; that's worth thousands to me! I've been a different man ever since; could not pray much, but I prayed the Lord to make a good fellow out of me. I have prayed every day since that night. We had a heavy storm coming to New York; we thought all would be lost, and I prayed, O my God, let me get back to thank that lady"! Putting a dollar on the table, he said, "You may want to give some other poor fellow a lodging." After kneeling in prayer, in which he joined with genuine earnestness, he extended his great, brawny hand, and the firm grasp corresponded with the hearty "thank you," which welled up from his heart. Who can compute the compound interest on the trifle—thirty cents?

A RECOVERY FROM SPINAL DISEASE.

In a letter recently received by Miss Carrie F. Judd, and published in her Triumphs of Faith, the writer says: "In January, 1879, I fell on the ice and injured the upper part of my spine. It would be a long story, if I could tell all that I went through for six years after that. I consulted one doctor after another, but medicine did me no good. Thirty-six blisters were applied at different times, beside many other applications. I suffered dreadfully, and sometimes felt as if my head were being twisted from my body. Most of the time I could not read, and I could not hold my head up for five minutes without supporting it with my hand. I had frequent hemorrhages, and my liver and stomach troubled me all the time. In June, 1883, I was obliged to take to my bed altogether, and could not sit up any for a year. I could not allow any one to remain in my room more than five minutes, and could scarcely endure to hear any one speak. My doctor had told me long before this that he could do nothing more for me. One day I was thinking of my dreadful condition, with no hope of ever being any better, of no use to myself and a great trouble to my dear brother, and I looked up to heaven and said, 'Lord, wilt thou not do something for me? Thou canst make me well if thou wilt,' and the Lord heard and answered. You prayed for me October 30, 1884. My disease was all removed that night. My face changed at once to a healthful color. It was a long time, however, before I was strong enough to work all day or go to church, which is about three-quarters of a mile from where I live, but I knew that I was healed. It was something new here, and people could hardly believe it. The next week after prayer was offered for me, I felt much worse, and could hardly walk for a week, but the Lord took these feelings away, and I have never felt any of my old trouble since."

A DEAD MAN'S SECRET.

A long search for hidden treasure has proved successful in Montana. Some thirteen years ago, a Frenchman and his son, a boy of fifteen, were prospecting near Helena. Finally the man, who was old and eccentric, sank a shaft near the summit of Old Bald Mountain. He was ridiculed for seeking gold in a place among the clouds. The Frenchman said nothing, but continued his work. He was extremely secretive, and not even his son knew the result of the labors in which he assisted. It appears, however, that the rock was so rich in gold that the old man cached it in order to prevent his secret leaking out. The boy and he continued working the shaft, the old man carefully concealing the product of their joint work. But one day, in hoisting a load of the precious ore, the rope broke, and the dead weight fell upon the old man, killing him instantly. After the funeral, the son remained two or three months on the place, searching for his father's hidden treasure. He could not find it, and finally abandoned the search for a time, carefully filling in the entrance to the shaft. He remained absent for two years, but at the end of that time he returned with money he had earned, and resumed his search. He took an old miner into his confidence, and together they made a minute examination of the locality. A press despatch from Helena now announces their success. The treasure has been found, and specimens sent to an expert for analysis. There are many sons of pious parents who would do well to exercise as much perseverance in seeking the treasure which made the lives of their parents blessed. That search would be successful and satisfying. (Prov. 2: 4, 5.)

CONVERSION THROUGH A VISION.

At a recent meeting at the Sailors' Mission in New York, a sailor from Maine, whose honest, frank face was evidence of his sincerity, related the following remarkable experience which led to his conversion:

"I was converted when I was eighteen, but did not intend to be. I went to a Methodist prayer-meeting, and when the invitation was given to those who had a desire for prayer, I raised my hand just for fun; they asked all to come forward. I went to the front merely to make fun, but when I knelt the Spirit of the Lord came upon me and took me at my word. I went home and told mother. For two or three weeks I was in great trouble, and could not pray. One night I lay tossing about on my bed, unable to sleep, trying to pray, but having no words. I lay so a long time, and it seemed to me that I was still wide awake when a bright light shone in the dark room. I lay still, awed by the strange light, when soon I distinctly heard the softest, sweetest music, as if angels were singing. I could not account for it, and whether I was sleeping or waking, I cannot say; but to me, it was so real and true that I cannot doubt the fact. Even the words printed themselves on my memory. It was an old Methodist hymn that was sung. As it ceased, the light disappeared. I was surely wide awake then, for I jumped out of bed and fell on my knees, and I could pray then."

The speaker is thirty-three years of age. He dates his conversion from that night when he knelt down after his vision and gave himself to God. His life in the fifteen years that have elapsed since, has been that of a simple, earnest, humble Christian.

THE APPROACHING APOSTACY.

By James Stephens, M. A.

Boastings of Progress—The Scriptural Warning—The Future Gloomy, Not Bright—The Days of Scoffers—Licentious Men—False Security—Apostasy Inevitable—Awful Ending of the Age—Antediluvian Scepticism—Present Indifference—The Practical Issue.

WE are told that we live in the age of progress. Comparisons are often made between the present time and times that are past, greatly to the advantage of the former. It is pointed out how, by means of education and the development of commerce and art and science, we are in far better circumstances than our forefathers were. And this is made a ground of expectation for the future.

Many of these statements, having regard as they have to secular things, we in no way wish to deny or call in question. But secular progress is in nowise identical with spiritual progress; and when Christian men speak as if the progress of this age were an upward progress, culminating in a world-wide triumph of Christianity, and the establishment of universal peace and brotherhood, we are obliged to demur, and to point out how contrary is the teaching of God's Word.

First, in II Tim. 3 we read words pointing out what shall be in the last days, clearly setting before us what our age is developing into. Its development is not in an upward direction, or toward universal conversion, but, on the contrary, toward the practice of daring sins. These daring sins will be associated with a form of godliness. There will be profession of God, but practical denial. And the consequent character of the last days will be that they will be perilous. God, whose eye surveys all the future, sees and tells us what our age is advancing to.

But further we find Peter in his Second Epistle writing that there shall come in the last days scoffers; unto this, then, our age is going on. We are not advancing to days of universal conversion, but to

for the Word of God. The scoffing will be on the part of those who have heard and who know that Word, and who are acquainted with its teaching on the subject of the second coming of Christ. Such scoffing is quite compatible with the great advances in science. Indeed, in these days, science is not infrequently marked by disregard, even daring disregard, for what God has said. Theories are started and maintained as if they were proved facts—theories which treat with disdain the historic authority of God's Word. Whatever attempts are made to show the reconciliation between revealed religion and science (and let us not undervalue these), yet, none the less really, will the last days be days of scoffing.

Men will walk after their own lusts, saying, Where is the promise of His coming? They will walk in wilfulness. They will be a law to themselves, and will put aside the will of God. Liberty will become lawlessness; and scepticism, as to the most definitely foretold fact of the coming of Christ, flaunt itself.

Nor will the scornful scepticism of the Coming be without some little show of reasonableness. Century after century passes, and all things continue as they were. There is no appearance or likelihood, they say, of anything supernatural. But they "wilfully forget" (II Pet. 3: 5, R. V.) that by the Word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth. They ignore the creative fiat of the Almighty, and they deny the very possibility of creation.

Our day, with its teaching of evolution, has connected itself with "the last days."

The Days of Scoffing.

That God made everything, "after its kind," as His Word affirms, has been denied, and even professing Christian teachers have been carried away in numbers by the evil current. It would almost seem as if in certain cases one would be esteemed to have forfeited his scientific, if not even his intellectual, reputation if he upheld the scriptural doctrine.

But we take a further step. Paul, when writing to the Thessalonians in his Second Epistle, tells us that before the day of the Lord comes the great apostasy will take place. Our age, then, is going on to apostasy, excelling all apostasy that has been known. There have been departures from Christ in different ages, but here we have the grand departure, a departure culminating in the manifestation of him who is called the man of sin.

Notwithstanding all progress in secular things, in science, and in art, there remains and grows rebellion against God. The days before the Flood were days of progress in arts (Gen. 4: 21, 22), and days of renown (Gen. 6: 4), but with this secular progress the imagination of men's hearts was evil continually, and the race became spiritually and morally utterly corrupt. And the present days have a likeness to the days before the Flood. With all the glorious increase to the number of Christ's disciples through times of refreshing, yet so far from the world getting converted, the world is in many cases converting and corrupting the Church. And we are going on to days when multitudes will depart from the profession of Christ to the denial of Him. The apostasy will take place.

What a fearful issue this is! What a solemn and with all its boasted civilization and refinement and culture and science and liberty! As we have seen, the age is advancing to the denial of godliness (though the form of godliness be held) to the scoffing at or denial of the Word, and finally to the denial of God Himself, and His only begotten Son. How different this from the thoughts of many, that commerce, education, and art, united with the preaching of the Gospel, will usher in the Millennium!

When our age reaches the fearful crisis that is foretold, then the Lord Jesus Christ must interpose in administrative and punative power. When man became wholly corrupt before the Flood, the Lord interposed in righteous judgment, and when the world becomes again mature in corruption, again there will be interposition in righteous judgment. The revelation of the Lord Jesus, to which His own people expectantly look, will be to others as was the Flood, or as the fire and brimstone which came on Sodom.

In the days of Noah men were living in scepticism of the fact of coming judgment. This is what is suggested by "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage." Notwithstanding the warnings given by Noah during one hundred and twenty years, there was utter unconcern and universal unbelief. Many may have said then, "Where is the threatened flood? all things continue as they were." In any case their manner of life expressed profound indifference to what was foretold. The Flood was at hand, and the world was "wilfully ignorant"; they knew not till it came.

As it was then, so shall it be in the last days. The Lord Jesus has indeed given the plainest warnings, and "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." With all the warnings, however, men will go on in their wilful course, and in lawlessness, and in mockery. And "when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction." When the Lord Jesus comes down upon this earth in judgment, His own will be like Noah in the ark. They will be gathered to Himself before the breaking forth of wrath, and after He shall thus have come forth in righteous and administrative power, executing judgment, and have bound Satan, millennial blessings shall crown this earth. What is of all this? The prospect of this age is indeed a dark one; and those who set forth God's Word as to the end of the age may be regarded as gloomy foreboders, men incapable of rightly appreciating the so-called good features of the times, and on these grounds have scant welcome, or even quarter. Such teaching is exceedingly opposed to the views of even Christian men. Still, if God condescends to make known the evil to come, we shall do well to lay it to heart.

LAWLESSNESS AND THE LAWLESS ONE.

From a Sermon by the Late Rev. Dean Vaughan.

ST. PAUL speaks (II Thess. 2: 3, 7, 8) of a certain particular growth and spirit of evil, which must have full scope and play before the Advent. Nor does he leave us in any uncertainty as to the direction in which we must look for the rise of that state of things which will bring down upon itself God's latest, sorest, and direst judgment. He selects for it a particular name, not one of the common names for sin in Scripture, but a name which he only uses twice or thrice in all his writings, and which has always a very definite and precise meaning. Our English version has somewhat lost sight of the peculiarity. It renders this word in one verse as "iniquity," and in the next verse "the wicked one"; but in the original the word is substantially the same in both verses—in the one "the mystery of lawlessness doth already work"; and, in the other, "then shall the lawless one be revealed."

This "lawlessness" of the seventh verse passes into the "lawless one" of the eighth—"then shall the lawless one be revealed"—unveiled or disclosed in all his features of horror and blasphemy—"whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming." St. Paul seems to prepare us for a sort of incarnation of lawlessness; principle, power, or person, sitting, as it were, in the very temple of God, "showing Himself that He is God," and yet, in reality, deriving from the devil all the "powers and signs of lying wonders" by which he deludes the unhappy victims who are not fortified and preoccupied by the devout love of the truth.

The important thought for us all is this, that lawlessness is the predicted characteristic of the last age, as the time of the end draws on, to be stimulated and exasperated into a terrible virulence. I ask this congregation, is it not now—is it not abroad on the Continent of Europe, is it not abroad in one integral portion of what we still fondly term "the United Kingdom"? Is it not abroad among ourselves; in the family and the church; in the workshop and in the study; in the literature of a "science falsely so-called"; and in the lurking-places of political fanatics, who count not their lives dear if they can but embitter an existence or topple down a throne?

A mystery of lawlessness is working everywhere with ingenious industry among the time-honored institutions of society itself. Frightful outbreaks of lawlessness have startled us again and again, until they have almost ceased to startle. We expect them; we look for them. Soon the paper will be flat and dull which records not one of them—assassinations and attempted assassinations of rulers, crowned and uncrowned, despotic, constitutional, or democratic—it matters not. These are but samples and specimens of a system which spares neither high nor low, which strikes not at oppression, but strikes at order, the determined foe of superiority, by one hair's breadth, of man over man. The owner of the decent home, the wearer of the decent coat, is an offence, an affront, to the evil eye that watches it.

Yes, the reign of lawlessness is begun, though a few years may yet intervene before the actual unveiling of the lawless one, who is to be destroyed by the personal advent of Christ.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as, when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk. Postage stamps should never be sent if it is possible to remit in any other way.

Receipts are not sent; the receipt of the paper by a subscriber is a sufficient proof that the remittance has been received. If the paper does not arrive promptly, please advise us, that we may see if the address is correctly entered.

Renewals can be sent any time previous to date of expiry, and the time will be added to that to which the subscriber is already entitled. Some time must always necessarily elapse after receipt of money before the date opposite to the name on label can be changed.

Notice of Expiration of subscription is always sent in addition to the date being given on the address label. When not renewed by date of expiration, the paper is stopped; no notice from the subscriber being required.

CURRENT EVENTS.

There is Still Doubt About the Politics of the next House. The "unofficial list" of members that appears in the Congressional Directory makes out a Republican majority of five, allowing for errors discovered since its preparation. This majority is obtained by listing Evans of Tennessee and two Republicans from West Virginia. It is still the belief of West Virginians that three Democrats will have certificates from that State. If they do, the Republican majority will disappear. If Evans of Tennessee is refused a certificate and it is given to the Republicans, they will number 163 and the Democrats 162. That outlook encourages the Democrats in doubting whether the Republicans can organize the House promptly enough to secure any early tariff legislation.

The Incorporation of the Nicaraguan Canal Company is meeting with unexpected opposition in the House. The bill passed the Senate comparatively unobstructed, but some causes are evidently operating in the House to delay, if not to kill it. As the bill before the House does not commit the United States to any financial responsibility, but simply gives the undertaking national approval and countenance, it has seemed to the public to be a worthy as well as a great enterprise, and as its practicability is assured upon the surveys of eminent and well-known engineers, who have recently made a careful examination of the proposed route, the opposition it is meeting with provokes adverse comment. The plan appears to be to so load it with amendments that the House may grow weary of the discussion and let the bill drop.

Our Dispute With Hayti, to Which the President briefly referred in his message, has reached a stage at which active measures are deemed necessary. The insurgent General Légitime, who is now the actual President of the Haytian Republic, though the dignity has not been formally conferred upon him, having failed to release the American steamer Haytian Republic, a naval expedition has been ordered to proceed to Port au Prince to enforce the demand of the United States Government. Admiral Luce was placed in charge of the expedition, which consisted of the Yantic, the Galena, and the Richmond. He was directed to present a formal demand for the release of the American vessel, and, if met with a refusal, to seize her by force of arms and carry her to some neutral ground for restoration to her owners. The Galena sailed on December 12, with Admiral Luce on board; but with the usual ill-fortune that seems to attend everything connected with our Navy Department, she had not proceeded many feet from her dock before she stuck ingloriously in the mud, and three powerful tugs were unable to drag the cumberous hulk off. She had to wait several hours for the turn of the tide before she could start on her voyage to uphold the dignity of the United States. After a delay of five hours she floated again, and was towed out of the harbor to meet the danger of a seven days' voyage to Hayti. There will probably be no difficulty in securing the result aimed at without resort to force. General Legitime being too shrewd a man to court a quarrel with the United States while his own position is far from fully established. President Cleveland's contention is that sufficient notice of a blockade had not been given, and that the blockade had not been maintained.

A Curious Joint Resolution on the Canadian question, which will probably arouse angry comment in Canada, was introduced in the House on December 13, by Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio. It authorizes the President "to invite negotiations looking to the assimilation and unity of the people of the Dominion of Canada and the United States under one Government, such unity and assimilation to be based upon the admission of the several provinces of the Dominion, or any one of them, into the Union of States, upon the same terms and equality with the several States now composing the Union, and the assumption by the United States of the indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada or a just proportion thereof, and such other equitable terms as justice to the high contracting parties may demand; and that, with a view to such negotiation, the President invite the appointment of Commissioners by the Government of Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada, to consider the wisdom and expediency of settling and adjusting all controversies and differences which now exist between the two Governments growing out of the fisheries, or otherwise, by such a union and assimilation as is hereinbefore suggested, either as to the whole or any province or several provinces of said Dominion."

The Distressing Fatality at Birmingham, Ala., on December 9 has aroused the interest of the whole country. Various views have been expressed about it, but there can be no question in the mind of the Christian patriot as to the right one. A man charged with brutal and unnatural murders had been arrested and lodged in jail. Public indignation was strongly felt against him, and threats of lynching were freely made. Men of conscience and influence endeavored to discourage the project, but without avail. A mass meeting numbering several thousands assembled on Sunday night and surrounded the prison in which the accused man was confined. Demands were shouted that he should be brought out, but the Sheriff refused. He warned the crowd that he and his men had arms, and would use them in case of an attack. The Sheriff says that the crowd threatened to blow up the jail with dynamite, and at last opened fire upon his men. Thereupon, having notified the crowd that he would fire if they did not withdraw, he gave the order and a volley was poured into the dense mass. Three men were killed on the spot, seven more were mortally wounded, all of whom have since died, and thirty others received wounds more or less serious. Unhappily, some of the men who fell were peaceable citizens who were trying to dissuade the mob from the attack. The sheriff has been arrested for murder, but it may be hoped that when public excitement has subsided the charge will not be pressed. He was engaged in the execution of his duty and was bound to defend his prisoner. It is time now that in a civilized country like this, the trial and execution of criminals should be conducted by the appointed authorities and not by an irresponsible mob.

A Massacre of Missionaries in China Was briefly reported last week by the New York Herald. It states that Miss Sophie Preston, of Waitsburg, Washington Territory, who went to China as a missionary two years ago, has been murdered near Canton, and several Europeans with her. There was a general uprising among the natives. The residence of the missionaries in which she lived was attacked at dead of night by several hundred Chinese armed with long spears, knives, and guns, and a number of people were killed. The mob next attacked the residence of some Europeans and slaughtered them without mercy. So far as known, there was no immediate cause for the massacre. Miss Preston was twenty-two years old, and a native of China, where her father was a missionary.

A Papal Rebuff to the Irish People was Administered last week. A telegram from Rome says: A sensation has been caused by the Pope's refusal to bless medals and reliquaries sent to Rome by an Irish priest who intended them for distribution in Ireland. The Pope sternly said:—"I cannot bless them. The people of Ireland are disobedient. They seem to prefer the gospel of Dillon and O'Brien to the Gospel of Jesus Christ." While such words may cause consternation in Ireland, their effect may be beneficial in the end. If the Pope's utterance should alienate the people from him there is more hope for them. They have been kept back from the light of the gospel mainly through their subjection to their priests, and after all, there is no boon that Parliament could grant, or the League achieve, which would be so beneficial to the country as its emancipation from Papal rule.

The Loan of Twenty Million Dollars to Russia by the French people was one of the significant events of the week. There has been considerable friction between the governments of Russia and Germany on financial subjects recently. The persistent efforts of the German press to discredit Russian securities has called forth a diplomatic protest from the Czar, who rightly believes that the Berlin government could stop the newspapers attacking him if they wished. Heretofore, the Russian government has relied mainly upon Berlin financiers for the vast sums needed to cover the annual deficits of the Russian Treasury. The French, however, having manifested their friendship for Russia, it was suggested to the Czar that if he were to offer the new loan of twenty million dollars, which he needs this year, in the French market, he would meet with much better success. He did so, and in one day seventy millions, more than three times his request were subscribed. This will cement the bond of friendship between Russia and France, and frees the former from the financial tutelage of Germany, which was often irksome in the past.

A Report that Mr. H. M. Stanley and Emin Pasha are prisoners in the hands of the Mahdi's troops was circulated last week. It emanated from the London Standard, which has had hitherto the most reliable press correspondents in Africa. It states that a letter received at Suakim from Osman Digna, the Mahdist General, contains, it has reason to believe, the news that Emin's troops have mutinied and delivered him, with a white prisoner supposed to be Stanley, to Osman Digna. With his letter, as proofs of the identity of his prisoners, Osman Digna sent several Snider cartridges, which, he alleged, were taken from the white traveller. The Zanzibaris in Stanley's expedition were armed with Snider rifles, but there were none in the possession of the dervishes. He also sends an official letter, which is recognized as one Stanley had in his possession. Osman Digna in his letter expressed a willingness to surrender Emin Pasha and his white companion provided Egypt would agree to abandon Suakim. If this proposal is not accepted, it is believed that both captives will be killed.

The Centenary of the Death of Rev. Charles Wesley, the poet of Methodism, was celebrated by two enthusiastic meetings held last week. On December 14, a union meeting was held in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, and on December 13 at Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn. At the latter a touching letter was read from the octogenarian author of the hymn "My Country, 'tis of Thee," the Rev. Samuel F. Smith. Over 1,200 persons were present, and joined heartily in the singing of Charles Wesley's hymns, led by a choir of forty voices. Addresses eulogizing the Wesleys and expressing appreciation of Methodist labor, were given by clergymen of various denominations. Among them were the Rev. Dr. Cuyler, the Rev. E. P. Thwing, the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Hall, Rector of Holy Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church, and by the Rev. Dr. W. C. P. Rhodes, of Marcy Avenue Baptist Church.

A Wonderful Movement at Walla Walla Wash, Ter., appears to have followed Mr. D. L. Moody's services there. Despatches to the Portland Oregonian say that never in the history of the city has there been such interest manifested as is now existing. As early as 6 o'clock the streets each side of the Opera House are densely packed with people waiting the opening of the doors. At that time enough people are in waiting to fill a building four times as large. Afternoon meetings are attended by a crowded house, and morning prayer-meetings by almost as many. The excitement with many is unprecedented some hardly stopping long enough to eat their meals. People in going to the meetings almost run. Men holding the hands of women fairly drag them along. The meetings inside are of the usual character of those Mr. Moody conducts. There is no resort to the exciting or sensational, but the work is extraordinary.

A Fatal Perversity Appears to Have Caused the loss of two promising lives at Cornell University on December 12. A number of students were skating, and others were on the bank fixing their skates. Among the latter a student of civil engineering, named Nevins, who while buckling the straps of his skates heard a crash. Looking up, he saw a lady with two children disappear through a hole in the ice. Instantly he plunged into the icy water after her. The students on the bank stretched themselves on the ice, and succeeded in rescuing the two children, who soon rose to the surface. Minutes passed, but young Nevins and the lady whom he went to rescue did not appear. The spectators were surprised, for Nevins was known to be a strong and expert swimmer. Several students dived into the water and one of them at last brought up the body of Mr. Nevins, and afterward the body of the lady was recovered. Both were quite dead. It is believed by all who knew the young man's power as a swimmer, that the lady must have been so terrified as to lose her presence of mind, and by trying to save herself, have thwarted the efforts of her rescuer, who could have saved her had she been passive. There are many awakened souls who might be saved if they would cease their efforts for self-salvation. When they learn that they can never save themselves, and trust only in Christ's power, then deliverance comes. (Rom. 10: 3.)

A Curious Freak of Fashion is Reported in the Fashion columns of the Philadelphia Record. It appears that the demand for girls who are skilful in embroidery, recently became so pressing as to attract the attention of a reporter, who visited one of the embroidery establishments that was doing a large business. He found a large number of girls, who were working at full speed and long hours to keep up with the press of orders. Inquiring what was being done, he was informed that "the girls of upper-tendom" have become infected with a craze for having monograms in gold or colored silks embroidered on the instep of their stockings, just at the lowest point exposed by the low shoes worn at balls and parties. In the majority of cases the monogram is composed of the initials of the wearer; but in some cases one of her feet will be decorated with her own initials, and the other with those of the gentleman whose wife she has promised to be. The result will evidently be significant of much. If at the aristocratic gatherings of the season, a young lady, who is engaged, persists, against her lover's wish, in wearing her own monogram on each foot, he will naturally conclude that she is ashamed to acknowledge the bond between them. In such assemblies there are often found persons who have pledged themselves to Christ. When, by their manner and conversation, those about them find no indications of such a pledge, their Lord is dishonored, and He is wounded in the house of His friends. (Zech. 13: 6.)

The Proposal to Tattoo Soldiers is Arousing considerable indignation among officers and men, and many citizens sympathize with them. The proposal emanated from a retired army officer, who, after an experience of forty-five years in the army, asserts that there is no other way to prevent the practice of desertion, which is now more prevalent than ever. He says that deserters come from two classes. One is composed of the men who are too restless to remain long in any pursuit, and the other of men who have entered the army in money or other trouble, and wish to remain only until the trouble is removed. A large proportion of the army comes from these two classes, and desertions are therefore numerous. He suggests that every soldier should be marked with a tattoo mark, which would involve him in the necessity of producing his discharge on being challenged when away from duty, or of being arrested as a deserter. Many enlist in the army of the Prince of Peace from unworthy motives, and afterward desert; and many, too, while retaining the name, neglect the great Captain's orders, and are absent from duty. But there is no need to tattoo soldiers who enlist in that army. The omniscient Lord knows them that are His (II Tim. 2: 19), and in the day of final reward, those who have neglected their duty will be brought to shame. (Matt. 25: 26–28.)

A Lady Locked in an Iron Safe had a Narrow escape from death in Washington, D. C., on December 8. She was engaged in a millinery store on F Street, and late in the evening went into the large safe-vault in the rear of the store to put away some articles of value from the stock. A clerk, who passed shortly afterward, seeing the safe-door open, and not knowing that she was inside, closed the door and turned the knob, thus setting the combination. The young lady's predicament was soon discovered, and caused great excitement from the fact that there was no one present who knew the combination. The question of engaging a safe-burglar was being seriously discussed, when some one suggested sending for the proprietor. That was done, and when he was found he at once came to the store and opened the safe, releasing the young lady from her perilous position. She had been locked in for over an hour, and might have suffocated to death if her release had been delayed much longer. In spiritual matters, persons are sometimes enmeshed through their own imprudence or that of others, and are in danger of disaster for time and eternity. Even the best and wisest advisers are often powerless to deliver them, but in such cases deliverance is sure if, as in the case in which the disciples failed, application is made to the Master. (Mark 9: 17–27.)

A Girl Was Released From Prison to Become a bride in Baltimore, Md., on December 13. She had been captured earlier in the week in a raid on a disorderly house, and was kept in prison to await her trial. In the course of Thursday a young man called on the captain of the police station in which she was confined, and after an interview with him, was permitted to talk to the prisoner. Apparently the result of the conversation was satisfactory, for the young man left in high spirits. He returned later in the day with legal papers authorizing the captain to release the prisoner. He was also accompanied by a dry-goods clerk, who brought several silk dresses, a bonnet, a plush sacque, and a complete set of underclothing. These were sent into the girl's cell, and she arrayed herself in the new attire. While this was being done the young man talked with the captain about his affairs. He said that he was a wealthy stock raiser and was making a big fortune. He was convinced that the girl would make him a good wife, and would abandon her evil ways. As soon as the transformation in the girl's appearance was complete they started for the Justice's room, where they were married, and then set out for the husband's home. Few men would have felt so much confidence in choosing a wife out of a prison, and if there really is good in the girl, she will show her appreciation by her future life. That is what Christ expects of His bride the Church. He found her Satan's captive and released her; clothed her with the robe of His righteousness, and espoused her to Himself. Unfaithfulness in her is therefore a hideous crime. (Rev. 19: 7, 8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Persons having written original hymns, are invited by Mr. G. Tabor Thompson, 295 Broad Street, Bridgeport, Conn., to send them to him, to set them to music.

The Rev. Dr. Cyrus F. Knight, Rector of St. James' Episcopal Church, Lancaster, Penn., has been elected Bishop of Milwaukee in succession to the late Bishop Wells.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the "Singing Pilgrim," gave his new illustrated song addresses at Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, December 11, 12, and 14.

As the result of a series of lectures delivered by Mr. George Woodford at Victoria, New Brunswick, nearly $2,000 has been raised towards a Rescue Home for women, to be established in that place.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has gone to Mentone to escape the rigors of the English winter. Two of his deacons accompanied him. During his absence his recent evening discourses will be published here.

Rev. S. N. Whiteson, of Raleigh, N. C., dropped dead of heart disease in a railroad station at Midway, Pa., on Monday, December 3. He had preached the day previous in the Baptist church on "Sudden Death."

Ben Hogan has been holding meetings at Olean, N. Y. The Olean Herald says that his graphic autobiographical story of his early life and conversion, frankly but cleanly told, chained the attention of an audience that tested the capacity of the large hall.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Davenport, Iowa, closed with a great jubilee-meeting, at which over two thousand persons were present, in the Rink. The mission has been much blessed. On December 9 Dr. Munhall commenced services in Bloomington, Ill.

The Children's Aid Society of New York is anxious to give dinners and gifts of clothing to poor, homeless children for Christmas. Any person willing to aid in the good work is invited to send provisions or clothing or money to the Secretary, Mr. C. L. Brace, 24 St. Mark's Place, N. Y.

The Baptist ministers of Chicago have requested the secular newspapers of the city not to publish the announcements of church services on Sunday; the Congregational and Methodist Episcopal ministers have since made the same request, to mark their disapproval of Sunday issues.

Dr. Pentecost has during the last few weeks been conducting evangelistic meetings in Dublin; two meetings at least were held each day, and much good is believed to have been done. Major Whittle's meetings in Belfast have also been much blest. He is now at Ballymena, Ireland.

At the revival services held by the Rev. B. Fay Mills in Germantown, Philadelphia, between nine hundred and one thousand persons professed conversion, and these have been distributed, by their own expressed choice, among the twelve churches of five denominations which united in the movement.

The conference held in New York recently, to consider the best means of reaching the masses, appointed a committee of twenty-five, representing the churches and missionary societies of the city, "for the careful study and execution of such plans as may seem to them wise for more efficient co-operation in aggressive Christian work, both on the part of the churches and existing missionary organizations."

The Next Few Weeks will be the best time for canvassing for new subscribers. We are happy to learn that many of our friends are already introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among their friends and neighbors. Any one desiring sample copies for this purpose, will be supplied free of cost by writing for them, stating explicitly how many can be advantageously used. Mr. Mutsu, Japanese Minister to the U. S.

Serious News Lightly Spoken.

taken by a coup de main that is one of the strangest incidents in history. It was the War of the Spanish Succession, waged by half Europe to determine which of two incompetents should occupy the throne of Spain. The English sent a squadron into the Mediterranean, under Sir George Rooke, who, after cruising about and accomplishing little, bethought himself, in order not to return in complete failure, to try his hand on Gibraltar. The place was well fortified with a hundred guns, but inside the walls only a hundred and fifty men, (a man and a half to a gun!) so that it could offer but a brief resistance to a bombardment, and so the Spaniards lost in three days what they spent more than three years in trying to recover, in vain.

MUNEMITSU MUTSU.

Japanese Minister to the U. S.

A SINGULARLY checkered life has been that of the gentleman whom the Japanese Government has sent to represent it in this country. The family to which he belongs is one of the most distinguished in Japan, but while he was still a youth it was proscribed, and the ancestral estates were confiscated. He devoted himself to private study, and soon won a prominent place among the adherents of the Mikado, whose fortunes he followed during the ascendency of the Shogunnite government. His life was frequently in peril, but his valor and prudence always extricated him from his complications. When the Mikado's power was established, Mutsu became one of his chief officers. He represented his government in Germany during the Franco-German War. On his return he was made Finance Minister, and afterward Vice-President of the Senate. His popularity with the Mikado and the people was unbounded, but the vicissitudes of political life had not been exhausted. Mutsu was deprived of offices and dignities, and found it advisable to take a foreign tour. He travelled extensively in Europe and America, making a study of the forms of government and the customs of the various peoples. His reappearance in Japan was greeted with a restoration to the royal favor, and he has now received the most coveted diplomatic post in the Mikado's gift.

Mr. Mutsu is forty-five years of age. He is a close student, a gifted orator, and is the author of several standard works used in the Japanese seats of learning.

TWO CHANGED LIVES.

(See Illustration.)

ON a beautiful moonlight evening two men ran a light rowing boat up on a sandy beach and sat down on a rough log to rest. They had about two miles to go to the little hotel where they proposed to pass the night. Strangely assorted companions they were, but each liked the other for the qualities he did not himself possess. Harry Bennett, the younger of the two, was an easy, good-natured fellow, with a moderate fortune inherited from his father. It was securely invested, and he lived luxuriously as a bachelor on its proceeds, without making any effort to increase his capital. John Hardcastle, his companion, was a hard-working builder, who had risen by sheer labor and frugality to the possession of a small fortune, to which he was adding year by year. He had been coaxed by his friend Bennett, to take a short holiday, and was now beginning it by a row along the coast.

"How beautifully serene everything is here," said Hardcastle. "One forgets, on such an evening as this, that not far away there are busy streets, and men toiling and perspiring in the struggle of life."

"Yes," said Bennett. "I suppose hard-working fellows like you enjoy such a scene. As for me, it seems dull and lifeless. It bores me; but then everything does bore me."

"I cannot conceive of you as being anything but bored," said Hardcastle. "You are such a luxurious fellow. If you tried work you would give it up quickly, for you would have no incentive to brace you up to overcome difficulties. Now I have a wife and a family of little children, and when I meet with an obstacle or something disagreeable, I see on the other side of it my children's bread and butter, and do not mind a little struggling nor a few knocks in trying to get it for them. Men like you, with no one depending on them and anxious only to amuse themselves, are of very little use in the world."

"You speak disparagingly of men like me, and I don't know but you may be right, but there are times in which I think we have the advantage of you. Now as I came down from the city this morning, I saw some men there who were in a good deal of trouble. A bank has burst, and I fancy it means ruin to some folks who will have to go under. I think some of them, if they are unencumbered bachelors, will be glad that they have neither wife nor children."

"What bank is it?" asked Hardcastle. "I make a point when I leave business to leave it altogether, and I never open a newspaper all the while I am away. So I have heard nothing of this bank failure, but I am sorry for the sufferers all the same, though I don't know them."

"It's Rufford's bank," said Bennett, rising as he spoke, and yawning and stretching himself, as if he were bored even by the conversation. But he was startled by the sound of a deep groan, and turning around, saw his companion with his head in his hands, and his body writhing as if in pain. "What's the matter, old fellow?" he asked. "Are you sick?"

"That bank, Harry, is the matter; every cent I have is there, and I paid in a big sum the very day I came down here. Harry, I'm ruined!"

"That is bad," said Harry. "Those rascals who manage these failures ought to be severely punished. But come, now; let us go up to the hotel and get a good night's rest. Things may not look so gloomy in the morning."

Hardcastle arose almost mechanically, and accompanied his friend to the hotel. But he had no expectation of a good night's rest. The proceeds of a life of hard, unremitting toil were swept away, and his wife and children, of whom he was so fond, were penniless.

The next morning Hardcastle was travelling as fast as an express train could take him to his home. His news was soon told. But from his wife he heard no reproaches, no lamentation, no childish repining, such as some women utter over their husband's misfortunes. A sweet, womanly pity filled her eyes, and she said: "My poor, brave husband, how you must be suffering! Let us pray to God for His guidance in our trouble."

For more than two hours the two had been engaged in conversation and prayer, and when at last they left their room and descended to the cosey parlor, in which so many happy hours had been spent, but which now they must prepare to leave, Hardcastle was full of chastened hope, and the bitterness of his trial was past.

As they entered, they heard the sound of some one talking to their children, and the husband at once recognized Bennett's voice. "Ha! Hardcastle," he said, as their entrance was perceived, "you see I have followed you. This husband of yours, madam," he said, turning to Helen, "was delivering a sage lecture to me, before he heard of his losses, on the advantage a married man has over a single one, and I thought I would come over and see how it stood the test. But, seriously, I have other business with you, Hardcastle, besides that. I am not such a brute as to intrude at such a time without good cause. You know what I am, an idle, careless dog, wasting my life, and as you told me last night, not much good in the world. But I have some money, and as you have brains I thought we might work well together. Now, if you will have me for a partner I am ready to go with you, and we will see whether you can make me of some use in the world."

Hardcastle was too much affected to speak, but he wrung his friend's hand, and for the first time for many a year his eyes filled with tears.

Bennett affected to be in haste, to avoid noticing his emotion, and said he must go away and get some clothes to wear instead of his yachting costume, which in his hurry to follow his friend he had neglected to change; and he would come in again shortly to hear what husband and wife thought of his proposal, after considering it.

When he was gone, Hardcastle and his wife returned to their room, and there poured out their hearts in thankfulness to God, who had heard their prayer before it was uttered, and had made a way of escape for them. There, too, Hardcastle registered a vow in God's strength, which he was enabled to keep, that for the remainder of his life he would acknowledge God in all his ways and look to Him to direct his steps.

A Scene in Chinatown, San Francisco.

CHINATOWN, SAN FRANCISCO.

EVERY visitor to San Francisco is taken to see the Chinese quarter. He takes a guard with him if he is prudent, for there are characters to be met with there who have little respect for law, and not much for life when money is to be made for taking it. The Chinese have erected but few buildings themselves in the section which they have made their own, but they have adapted the houses they found there to their own customs, and by making balconies, and putting up awnings and lanterns, have transformed the locality into as near an imitation of Chinese towns as they are able. Much has been written by visitors of the horrors they have seen in the gambling dens and opium joints which abound. It is gratifying to learn that of late years the efforts made to suppress these fearful evils have had some success, though there are sufficient still existing to call for earnest Christian effort.

There are over 30,000 Mongolians collected in the comparatively small area, and they herd together in such close propinquity as to make it a mystery how in such foul air, and amid such dirt, life can be sustained. The restaurants of Chinatown, which are numerous, present the most characteristic features of the race, not only as to the viands prepared, but the manner of consuming them. In some of them, however, the American taste and habits have exercised an influence. One gentleman who visited the quarter recently, dined there as an experiment. He says that he had chicken soup with a paste resembling macaroni, a tender chicken sliced through, bones and all, served in a bowl; another bowl of duck; and quail and spinach served in a pewter chafing dish. These were placed on the table, and the diners helped themselves from the common stock with pairs of ebony chopsticks, to such morsels as they might desire.

In San Francisco as everywhere else, the most potent moralizing and reforming influence has been found, not in the severity of the laws, but in the Christian labors of the servants of Christ, notably in the efforts of devoted ladies who have opened Sunday-schools for the Chinese, and have had the blessing of God on their work.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Received into the Church.

IN the afternoon I attended a meeting of a still more interesting character. These Sunday-afternoon meetings were held for the purpose of receiving the Sacrament, and the confirmation of those who had been baptized during the week; they were intended exclusively for the Saints, but for certain reasons I was permitted to be present. The meeting was opened with singing and prayer, and then the presiding Elder—Brother Cowdy—arose, and invited all those who had been baptized during the week to come to the front seats. Several ladies and gentlemen came forward, and also three little children. Upon inquiry, I found that children of eight years of age were admitted members of the church by baptism—which is administered by immersion. At that age they are supposed to understand what they are doing; but before that, if of Mormon parents, they are considered members of the church by virtue of the blessing which they received in infancy.

Brother Cowdy—the presiding Elder—then called upon two other Elders to assist him in the confirmation. One of the ladies took off her bonnet, but retained her seat, when all three of the elders placed their hands upon her head, and one of them said: "Martha; by virtue of the authority vested in us, we confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and as you have been obedient to the teachings of the Elders, and have gone down into the waters of baptism for the remission of your sins, we confer upon you the gift of the Holy Ghost, that it may abide with you for ever, and be a lamp unto your feet, and a light upon your pathway, leading and guiding you into all truth. This blessing we confirm upon your head, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Then, before they took their hands off her head, the presiding Elder asked the other two if they wished to say anything. Whereupon one of them began to invoke a blessing upon the newly confirmed sister. He spoke for some time with extreme earnestness, when suddenly he was seized with a nervous trembling which was quite perceptible, and which evidently betokened intense mental or physical excitement. He began to prophecy great things for this sister in the future, and in solemn and mysterious language proclaimed the wonders which God would perform for her sake. When we consider the excited state of her mind, and—if the statements of psychologists be true—the magnetic currents which were being transmitted from the sensitive nature of the man into the excited brain of the new convert, together with the pressure of half a dozen human hands upon her head, it is not at all astonishing that when the hands were lifted off she should firmly believe that she had been blessed indeed. She had been told that she should receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; and she did not for an instant doubt that her expectations had been realized. Each of the newly baptized went through the same ceremony, and then they all partook of the Sacrament, when, after another hymn, the meeting was closed with prayer.

In the evening I returned, to listen to a lecture upon "the character, spirit, and genius" of the new church, delivered by Elder Stenhouse; and I was captivated by the picture which he drew of the marvellous latter-day work which he affirmed had already begun. The visions of bygone ages were again vouchsafed to men; angels had visibly descended to earth; God had raised up in a mighty way a Prophet, as of old, to preach the dispensation of the last days; gifts of prophecy, healing, and the working of miracles were now, as in the days of the Apostles, witnesses to the power of God. The long-lost tribes of Israel were about to be gathered into the one great fold of Christ; and the fullness of the Gentiles being come, they, too, were to be taken under the care of the Good Shepherd. All were freely invited to come and cast away their sins, ere it was too late; and the fullest offers of pardon, grace, sanctification, and blessing, in this world and in the next, were presented to every repentant soul.

Surely, I thought, these are the self-same doctrines which my mother taught me when I knelt beside her in childhood, and which I have so often heard—only in colder and less persuasive language—urged from the pulpits of those whom I have ever regarded in the light of true disciples of Jesus. Who can wonder that I listened with rapt attention, and that my heart was even then half won to the new faith? The days passed; and as I pondered over these things, it appeared to me that I had at last found that which I had so long earnestly desired and prayed for—a knowledge of that true religion for which the Saviour presented Himself a Holy Sacrifice, and which the Apostles preached at peril of their lives—the only faith in which I might find joy and peace in believing.

But why should I dwell upon those moments, soul-absorbing as was their interest to me then—sadly-pleasing as is their memory now? The reader can see the drift of my thoughts at that time; and I feel sure, although I have but hastily sketched the causes which brought about these great changes in my religious belief and in my life, that he will not hastily accuse me of fickleness and love of change, if he himself has fought the battles of the soul, and has learned, even in a slight measure, to realize the mystery of his inner being. Each day the finger of destiny drew me nearer to the final step.

The young Elder whose words I had listened to with such strange and, to me, momentous results, was intimate with my father's family, and called frequently to see us, and before long he convinced me that it was my duty to test for myself whether the work was of God, or not. In the agitated state of my mind at that time, I could not withstand the earnest appeals which were made to my affections and hopes; and within two weeks after my arrival in England I became formally a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; or, in more popular language—I became a Mormon. The day was fixed for my baptism. Several others were to be baptized at the same time; for scarcely a week passed without quite a number of persons joining the Church. For this purpose we all repaired to a bathhouse on the banks of the Southampton River. This place was not perhaps the most convenient, and it certainly was devoid of the slightest tinge of romance; but it was the only one available to the Saints at that time.

When we were all assembled and had united in singing and prayer, Elder Stenhouse went down into the water first, and then two men went down and were baptized, and came up again. Now came my turn. I was greatly agitated, for I felt all the solemnity of the occasion. I had dressed myself very neatly and purely, for I believed that angel eyes were upon me; I wished to give myself a perfect and acceptable offering to my God, and I was filled with the determination henceforth to devote my whole life to His service. As I went down into the waters of baptism, how thankful I felt that it had been my privilege to hear the Gospel in my youth, for now I could give my heart in all its freshness to the Lord, before it had been chilled by the cold, hard experience of life.

I descended the steps, and Elder Stenhouse came forward and led me out into the water; then, taking both my hands in one of his, he raised his other hand toward heaven, and in a solemn and impressive voice, he said: "Fanny: by virtue of the authority vested in me, I baptize you for the remission of your sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Then he immersed me in the water; and as I reascended the steps I really felt like another being; all my past was buried in the deep—the waters of baptism had washed away my sins; and a new life lay open before me, in which my footsteps would be guided by the inspired servants of God. All now would be peace and joy within me, for I had obeyed the commands of God, and I doubted not that I should receive the promised blessing, and that now I could indeed go on my way rejoicing. My baptism took place one Saturday afternoon, and the afternoon following I was confirmed a member of the Church. Elder Stenhouse presided at the meeting, and he, with Elder Cowdy and two other Elders, confirmed me. As the "blessing" which I then myself received differs somewhat from the one which I have already given, and as it is a very fair specimen of those effusions, I present it to the readers in full.

Elder Stenhouse, Elder Cowdy, and the two other Elders, placed their hands solemnly upon my head, and Elder Stenhouse said: "Fanny: by virtue of the authority vested in me, I confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and inasmuch as you have been obedient to the command of God, through His servants, and have been baptized for the remission of your sins, I say unto you that those sins are remitted. And in the name of God I bless you, and say unto you, that inasmuch as you are faithful and obedient to the teachings of the priesthood, and seek the advancement of the kingdom, there is no good thing that your heart can desire that the Lord will not give unto you. You shall have visions and dreams, and angels shall visit you by day and by night. You shall stand in the Temple of Zion, and administer to the Saints of the Most High God. You shall speak in tongues, and prophecy, and the Lord shall bless you abundantly, both temporally and spiritually. These blessings I seal upon your head, inasmuch as you shall be faithful; and I pray heaven to bless you; and say unto you—Be thou blessed, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

After the meeting, I received the congratulations of all the Saints present, and more particularly those of my own family. My dear mother and father were overjoyed; and I now learned how anxious they had been, and how they had feared that I should return to France and reject the faith of the new dispensation. Altogether we were very happy. Elder Stenhouse and Elder Cowdy returned home with us to tea, and afterwards we all attended the usual evening lecture. In this way was passed one of the happiest days of my life—one which I shall ever remember—and yet that memory will always be mingled with regret that so much love and devotion as I then felt were not enlisted in a better cause.

Thus began a new era in my life. All my former friends and associations were now to be remembered no more; my lot was cast among the Saints; and in the state of my mind at that time, I believed that I should be happy in my new position, and resolved to give evidence of the sincerity of my faith. The untiring energy and restless activity of Elder Stenhouse was ever before our eyes, and inspired all who associated with him with a similar enthusiam. There were no drones in that hive. The brethren, at a word from him, would roam the country, teaching and preaching in the open air, while the sisters would go from house to house in the city, distributing tracts about the new faith. I caught the enthusiam of the rest, and was soon in the ranks with the other sisters, as devoted in my endeavors as a young, ambitious heart could be. I was, indeed, like one born again from an old existence into a new life. I felt grateful and happy—I began to dream of the eternal honor which crowns a faithful missionary life; and I soon found an ample field for testing my fitness for that vocation.

At the time of which I speak, the Primitive Methodists in England were doing a great work in the way of converting sinners. Their missionaries were zealous and devoted men, though generally poor and uneducated. They resembled very closely the Mormon Elders in their labors; and, in fact, a very large number of the leading Mormons had been Methodist local preachers, and the greater number of the new-born Saints had come from that denomination with their former teachers, or had followed them soon after. The change from Methodist to Mormon was, in course of time, very strongly marked; but for a considerable period the same, or what seemed the same, influences were at work among the people. Remarkable scenes of excitement were often witnessed at the "love feasts"; and from the "anxious seats," as they were called, might be heard the entreaties of self-accusing souls, frightened by a multitude of sins, crying earnestly, nay, wildly, for grace, mercy, and the Holy Ghost; while many of the supplicants would fall upon the ground, completely overcome by nervous excitement. Then they would have visions, and behold great and unutterable things, receive the forgiveness of their sins, and, coming back to consciousness, believe themselves now to be the children of God, and new creatures, doubting not that they would, ever after, be happy in the Lord. The experience of the Saints at their meetings, when Mormonism was first preached, was exactly similar to this. Into the psychological, moral, or religious causes of these scenes of excitement I cannot here enter; I simply mention facts as they came under my own observation.

The Mormon missionary often came upon whole communities in the rural districts of England where this "good time" was in full operation; and being a man of texts he would follow up the revival, preaching that the spirit of the prophet was subject to the prophet, and not the prophet subject to the spirit. Controversy would arise, and his appeal to Scripture, literally interpreted, was almost invariably triumphant. Even in America, especially in New York and Ohio, the same causes produced the same effects. It was after his mind was excited by a general revival near his native place that Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, received his first religious impression. His followers, even in the early days of the Church and revival meetings, and meetings at which the most extraordinary excitement was manifested—when the Saints fell into ecstatic trances—saw heaven opened, and spake with tongues. But Joseph, shrewd man as he was, albeit "a prophet," when he found too many rival seers were coming into the field, announced by "special revelation" that these too gifted persons were possessed by devils, and their visions and prophesyings must be suppressed. And he did suppress them.

Not long after my own baptism I was present at a meeting of this description in Southampton. It was called a "testimony meeting," and was held in a large upper room situated, if I rightly remember, in Chandos Street. No one from the outside would have supposed that it was the place of assembly of the Saints, for it was generally used for ordinary secular meetings, and I have heard that great objections were at first raised as to the propriety of letting it to the Mormons.

As we entered the door we were saluted by Brother Williams, who expressed great pleasure at seeing us. There was a full attendance of the Saints, and every face wore an expression of peaceful earnestness. A person who has never attended a Mormon meeting can form no idea of the joyous spirit which seemed to animate every one present. I am not, of course, speaking of modern meetings, but of meetings as they used to be. Whence and whatever that "spirit" might be which moved the sisters and brethren when they met in early times, I cannot tell; but I, and with me 10,000 Mormons and seceding Mormons in Utah, can testify that that spirit no longer visits the Tabernacle services over which Brigham Young presided, or the meetings of the Saints since they adopted the accursed doctrine of polygamy, and forsook the gentle leadings of their first love. Often have I heard Mormons of good standing and high position in the Church lament the "good old times" as they called them, when the outpouring of the Spirit was so abundant, and mourn over the cold, barren services of the present day. But the Elders say it is the fault of the people themselves, and because their own hearts have become cold.

At the Testimony meeting of which I speak, a happy spirit was peculiarly present. An encouraging smile or a kind word greeted me on every side, and, as a newly converted sister, I received the most cordial welcome. The brethren were seated on forms and chairs and any other convenient article which came to hand, while at the further end of the room was Brother Bench, who was to preside, and with him several other leading elders. Brother Bench gave out a suitable hymn. The whole congregation joined in the singing, and every heart seemed lifted up with devotion. Then another elder rose, and offered a spirit-moving prayer; and then the brother who presided stated that for the time he withdrew his control of the proceedings, and, as the phrase was, he "put the meeting in the hands of the Saints," exhorting them not to let the time pass by unimproved.

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson Suggested for December 30, II Tim. 3: 14-17.

Christians who Do not Carry their Bibles Around—Neglecting to Verify Quotations in Church—How to Gain Familiarity with the Bible—Incident of a Disobedient Child—Reminiscence of Christian Work in Germany—The Comprehensiveness of the Book—A Refractory Servant—A Dressmaker Encouraged—Remarkable Conversion of a Soldier.

A SOLDIER without a sword! Such is every Christian who ventures into a religious meeting without his Bible. He is like a seaman without a chart, a traveller without a guide-book, a workman without a tool, an astronomer without a telescope, a surgeon without an instrument. It is astonishing, in numberless congregations, especially those of Nonconformists, to see hardly a Bible in the place, except that which is used by the minister! It is the custom of the Roman Catholic to carry his missal with him to church, and he is not ashamed to carry his books of devotion with him into a horse-car or a railway carriage. The churchman carries his prayer-book and Bible as well as his hymn-book to church; the churchman is

Not Ashamed of His Bible.

The Scotch Presbyterians are seen on the Sunday morning walking to church with their Bibles under their arms or in their hands; and in every religious meeting in Scotland the audience is accustomed to turn to the passages quoted by the preacher, and so to gain by every religious service in the knowledge of the Bible; the Scotchman is not ashamed of his Bible. But among English dissenters, in America, and in the Protestant countries of Europe, the use of the Bible in church is scarcely known. Why should a Lutheran, or Free Church Swiss, an English Wesleyan, Baptist, or Independent, be ashamed to carry and to use his Bible? The consequence is that the greatest ignorance of the Bible prevails; in a Bible-reading we find people looking for Revelations among the Books of Moses, and for the minor prophets among the Epistles! Numbers of men who are members of churches can find a place in a railway guide with the greatest readiness, while it would take them half an hour to discover the locality of one of the sayings of Jeremiah, or some passage in Deuteronomy!

How can I get a knowledge of my Bible? many say. By the simplest process: make use of your Bible whenever you have an opportunity; carry it to church, and, when the Lesson is read, find the place and read after the minister. When he refers to any text in his sermon, find the place, and read it, that you may remember it again. Always bring your Bible to family prayer, and follow the reader; if possible, form the good habit of reading round verse by verse, so that all may take part. Then, when any special thing occurs in your family, say a birth, a marriage, or a death, search in your Bible all which God says about it. If you are in perplexity, search what God says about perplexity; if in fear, what He says about fear; if in want, what He says about His children's needs. If a child is naughty, search what He says about a parent's training.

of seven years old was one day very naughty; he had been impertinent to his governess, and would not acknowledge his fault. After being kept in bed twelve hours, he at last yielded, and owned himself in the wrong, and then asked his mother to read him from the Bible all the directions which God has given for parents to punish their children. Happily the mother knew her Bible, and was able at once to turn to every passage. But what respect would the child have had for his mother if she had been obliged to confess she did not know these passages?

The Christian's sword exercise consists in knowing how to handle the Bible. Paul writes to Timothy as one who from a child has known the Holy Scriptures. In those days portable Bibles were out of the question; the huge parchment rolls then in use could not be carried from place to place. Timothy must have learned the Holy Scriptures by heart. But how great an advantage we have with pocket Bibles, which we can, and ought to, carry everywhere with us! Some will say, "I find it a distraction to read after the minister, I would rather listen." Suppose a child learning geography thought it a great distraction to be referred to the map! Is it not rather a lazy way of listening when we do not take the trouble to compare Scripture with Scripture, and so take from God and not from the minister the truths which are being taught? Another objection is, "I am so unused to handle my Bible, that I should feel awkward." But every one is awkward in the commencement of anything that is new to him. The writer, when evangelizing in Switzerland and Germany, often held meetings in villages where the Bible was very little known. She carried a certain number of Bibles with her, and lent them to the people who occupied the first rows of seats, and exhorted all the other people to bring their own Bibles to the next meeting. She then gave time, whenever she quoted a passage, for the people to find it. The consequence was that hundreds bought portable Bibles, and began to study them; many souls were brought to Christ; and a large number of weekly Bible-readings were formed among those who had found Jesus.

The apostle Paul says that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness,

That the Man of God May be Perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works. (II Tim. 3: 16.) Oh how unfurnished are those who know little of their Bibles! The Bible, not certain parts of it, but the whole Bible, furnishes us with doctrine. A man who thoroughly knows all his Bible, cannot well be a hasty man. He will give elbow room to those who do not see just as he sees, because he will see how comprehensive is the Word of God. But at the same time he will be guarded from extravagances and errors, because he will accept nothing which is not clearly stated in the Word. The Bible "is profitable. . . for correction"; not only the correction of our own individual souls, but it decides points between husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, poor and rich, believer and unbeliever, in such a way that, to a subject mind, really yielded to God, there can be no difficulty in knowing the will of God. A minister one day asked the writer to speak to of his. The girl was full of her own wrongs, bitter in spirit, and indignant against her employer, and yet to all appearance the fault was her own; she wanted to have everything her own way, and because her employer was a Christian, she thought he ought not to oppose her in anything. The writer prayed the Lord for direction, and then asked the girl to open her Bible at I Tim. 6: 1, 2: "Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefits." The poor girl did not know such words existed in the Bible. She at once went to her employer, humbled herself, and did her work as he willed, and cheerfully, because she acknowledged the authority of God.

By handling the Word of God more, things are discovered which we have not noticed before. An earnest Christian dressmaker, who had to support herself and mother, one day mourned that she could not do more spiritual work, when a friend pointed out to her that God's Holy Spirit was not above instructing in the use of the needle. "The Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, . . . and he hath filled him with the Spirit of God . . . all manner of work, of the embroiderer, in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen etc." (Ex. 35: 30-35.) A cook may feel how much more dignity there is in her work, when she sees that one of God's Levites "had the set office over the things that were made in the pans" (I Chron. 9: 31.) Gardeners may be encouraged when they know that the Bible speaks of "potters, and those that dwelt among plants and hedges: there they dwelt with the king for his work." (I Chron. 4: 23.) The mill girls in Lancashire, and in the north of Ireland, may like to hear of "the families of the house of them that wrought fine linen:" (I Chron. 4: 21.)

If the man of God is to be perfect through his knowledge of the Word of God, how many imperfect Christians there must be! How many unfurnished ones! Surely if the Bible were carried to religious meetings, and there studied, and places marked with pencil to help the memory, the conversation over the dinner or tea table would not be so often on the minister or speaker, but rather on the truth which he had taught, and so the minds of the people would be more exercised upon the Word of God. It is a precious thing to be familiar enough with the text of Scripture to be ready always to give a reason of the hope which is in us in Scripture language. In a testimony meeting, it is most refreshing to hear testimonies which have become a living and precious reality to the speaker. Nothing has such power with the unawakened, with these sinners, or with sceptics and infidels, as the Word of God itself. They may scoff at it, but God has declared that it is "quick (or living) and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." (Heb. 4: 12.) A soldier had been urged by a Christian worker to turn to the Lord. He met all her entreaties with blaspheming and ridicule. Impelled by the Spirit of God, she said at last one day only these words, "He that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." (Prov. 29: 1.) He went away with a jeering word, but on his way the words rang through his mind again and again with such power that he threw himself upon his knees, and sought and found the Lord.

God's Word partakes of His own Almightiness; how strange that we should prefer our poor powerless words to His! The best of human utterances are but dilutions of the Word of God: undiluted it has wondrous power. If my readers should be stirred up by these words to search the Scriptures, and to make use of their Bible as their daily and hourly hand-book, their constant companion, their indispensable requisite at all times, I shall not have written or prayed in vain. And it is with earnest prayer that these few feeble words are sent forth. "For it is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life." (Deut. 32: 47.) "The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

then half won to the new faith? The days passed; and as I pondered over these things, it appeared to me that I had at last found that which I had so long earnestly desired and prayed for—a knowledge of that true religion for which the Saviour presented Himself a Holy Sacrifice, and which the Apostles preached at peril of their lives—the only faith in which I might find joy and peace in believing.

But why should I dwell upon those moments, soul-absorbing as was their interest to me then—sadly-pleasing as is their memory now? The reader can see the drift of my thoughts at that time; and I feel sure, although I have but hastily sketched the causes which brought about these great changes in my religious belief and in my life, that he will not hastily accuse me of fickleness and love of change, if he himself has fought the battles of the soul, and has learned, even in a slight measure, to realize the mystery of his inner being. Each day the finger of destiny drew me nearer to the final step.

The young Elder whose words I had listened to with such strange and, to me, momentous results, was intimate with my father's family, and called frequently to see us, and before long he convinced me that it was my duty to test for myself whether the work was of God, or not. In the agitated state of my mind at that time, I could not withstand the earnest appeals which were made to my affections and hopes; and within two weeks after my arrival in England I became formally a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; or, in more popular language—I became a Mormon. The day was fixed for my baptism. Several others were to be baptized at the same time; for scarcely a week passed without quite a number of persons joining the Church. For this purpose we all repaired to a bathhouse on the banks of the Southampton River. This place was not perhaps the most convenient, and it certainly was devoid of the slightest tinge of romance; but it was the only one available to the Saints at that time.

When we were all assembled and had united in singing and prayer, Elder Stenhouse went down into the water first, and then two men went down and were baptized, and came up again. Now came my turn. I was greatly agitated, for I felt all the solemnity of the occasion. I had dressed myself very neatly and purely, for I believed that angel eyes were upon me; I wished to give myself a perfect and acceptable offering to my God, and I was filled with the determination henceforth to devote my whole life to His service. As I went down into the waters of baptism, how thankful I felt that it had been my privilege to hear the Gospel in my youth, for now I could give my heart in all its freshness to the Lord, before it had been chilled by the cold, hard experience of life.

I descended the steps, and Elder Stenhouse came forward and led me out into the water; then, taking both my hands in one of his, he raised his other hand toward heaven, and in a solemn and impressive voice, he said: "Fanny: by virtue of the authority vested in me, I baptize you for the remission of your sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

Then he immersed me in the water; and as I reascended the steps I really felt like another being; all my past was buried in the deep—the waters of baptism had washed away my sins; and a new life lay open before me, in which my footsteps would be guided by the inspired servants of God. All now would be peace and joy within me, for I had obeyed the commands of God, and I doubted not that I should receive the promised blessing, and that now I could indeed go on my way rejoicing. My baptism took place one Saturday afternoon, and the afternoon following I was confirmed a member of the Church. Elder Stenhouse presided at the meeting, and he, with Elder Cowdy and two other Elders, confirmed me. As the "blessing" which I then myself received differs somewhat from the one which I have already given, and as it is a very fair specimen of those effusions, I present it to the readers in full.

Elder Stenhouse, Elder Cowdy, and the two other Elders, placed their hands solemnly upon my head, and Elder Stenhouse said: "Fanny: by virtue of the authority vested in me, I confirm you a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and inasmuch as you have been obedient to the command of God, through His servants, and have been baptized for the remission of your sins, I say unto you that those sins are remitted. And in the name of God I bless you, and say unto you, that inasmuch as you are faithful and obedient to the teachings of the priesthood, and seek the advancement of the kingdom, there is no good thing that your heart can desire that the Lord will not give unto you. You shall have visions and dreams, and angels shall visit you by day and by night. You shall stand in the Temple of Zion, and administer to the Saints of the Most High God. You shall speak in tongues, and prophecy, and the Lord shall bless you abundantly, both temporally and spiritually. These blessings I seal upon your head, inasmuch as you shall be faithful; and I pray heaven to bless you; and say unto you—Be thou blessed, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

After the meeting, I received the congratulations of all the Saints present, and more particularly those of my own family. My dear mother and father were overjoyed; and I now learned how anxious they had been, and how they had feared that I should return to France and reject the faith of the new dispensation. Altogether we were very happy. Elder Stenhouse and Elder Cowdy returned home with us to tea, and afterwards we all attended the usual evening lecture. In this way was passed one of the happiest days of my life—one which I shall ever remember—and yet that memory will always be mingled with regret that so much love and devotion as I then felt were not enlisted in a better cause.

Thus began a new era in my life. All my former friends and associations were now to be remembered no more; my lot was cast among the Saints; and in the state of my mind at that time, I believed that I should be happy in my new position, and resolved to give evidence of the sincerity of my faith. The untiring energy and restless activity of Elder Stenhouse was ever before our eyes, and inspired all who associated with him with a similar enthusiam. There were no drones in that hive. The brethren, at a word from him, would roam the country, teaching and preaching in the open air, while the sisters would go from house to house in the city, distributing tracts about the new faith. I caught the enthusiam of the rest, and was soon in the ranks with the other sisters, as devoted in my endeavors as a young, ambitious heart could be. I was, indeed, like one born again from an old existence into a new life. I felt grateful and happy—I began to dream of the eternal honor which crowns a faithful missionary life; and I soon found an ample field for testing my fitness for that vocation.

At the time of which I speak, the Primitive Methodists in England were doing a great work in the way of converting sinners. Their missionaries were zealous and devoted men, though generally poor and uneducated. They resembled very closely the Mormon Elders in their labors; and, in fact, a very large number of the leading Mormons had been Methodist local preachers, and the greater number of the new-born Saints had come from that denomination with their former teachers, or had followed them soon after. The change from Methodist to Mormon was, in course of time, very strongly marked; but for a considerable period the same, or what seemed the same, influences were at work among the people. Remarkable scenes of excitement were often witnessed at the "love feasts"; and from the "anxious seats," as they were called, might be heard the entreaties of self-accusing souls, frightened by a multitude of sins, crying earnestly, nay, wildly, for grace, mercy, and the Holy Ghost; while many of the supplicants would fall upon the ground, completely overcome by nervous excitement. Then they would have visions, and behold great and unutterable things, receive the forgiveness of their sins, and, coming back to consciousness, believe themselves now to be the children of God, and new creatures, doubting not that they would, ever after, be happy in the Lord. The experience of the Saints at their meetings, when Mormonism was first preached, was exactly similar to this. Into the psychological, moral, or religious causes of these scenes of excitement I cannot here enter; I simply mention facts as they came under my own observation.

The Mormon missionary often came upon whole communities in the rural districts of England where this "good time" was in full operation; and being a man of texts he would follow up the revival, preaching that the spirit of the prophet was subject to the prophet, and not the prophet subject to the spirit. Controversy would arise, and his appeal to Scripture, literally interpreted, was almost invariably triumphant. Even in America, especially in New York and Ohio, the same causes produced the same effects. It was after his mind was excited by a general revival near his native place that Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, received his first religious impression. His followers, even in the early days of the Church and revival meetings, and meetings at which the most extraordinary excitement was manifested—when the Saints fell into ecstatic trances—saw heaven opened, and spake with tongues. But Joseph, shrewd man as he was, albeit "a prophet," when he found too many rival seers were coming into the field, announced by "special revelation" that these too gifted persons were possessed by devils, and their visions and prophesyings must be suppressed. And he did suppress them.

Not long after my own baptism I was present at a meeting of this description in Southampton. It was called a "testimony meeting," and was held in a large upper room situated, if I rightly remember, in Chandos Street. No one from the outside would have supposed that it was the place of assembly of the Saints, for it was generally used for ordinary secular meetings, and I have heard that great objections were at first raised as to the propriety of letting it to the Mormons.

As we entered the door we were saluted by Brother Williams, who expressed great pleasure at seeing us. There was a full attendance of the Saints, and every face wore an expression of peaceful earnestness. A person who has never attended a Mormon meeting can form no idea of the joyous spirit which seemed to animate every one present. I am not, of course, speaking of modern meetings, but of meetings as they used to be. Whence and whatever that "spirit" might be which moved the sisters and brethren when they met in early times, I cannot tell; but I, and with me 10,000 Mormons and seceding Mormons in Utah, can testify that that spirit no longer visits the Tabernacle services over which Brigham Young presided, or the meetings of the Saints since they adopted the accursed doctrine of polygamy, and forsook the gentle leadings of their first love. Often have I heard Mormons of good standing and high position in the Church lament the "good old times" as they called them, when the outpouring of the Spirit was so abundant, and mourn over the cold, barren services of the present day. But the Elders say it is the fault of the people themselves, and because their own hearts have become cold.

At the Testimony meeting of which I speak, a happy spirit was peculiarly present. An encouraging smile or a kind word greeted me on every side, and, as a newly converted sister, I received the most cordial welcome. The brethren were seated on forms and chairs and any other convenient article which came to hand, while at the further end of the room was Brother Bench, who was to preside, and with him several other leading elders. Brother Bench gave out a suitable hymn. The whole congregation joined in the singing, and every heart seemed lifted up with devotion. Then another elder rose, and offered a spirit-moving prayer; and then the brother who presided stated that for the time he withdrew his control of the proceedings, and, as the phrase was, he "put the meeting in the hands of the Saints," exhorting them not to let the time pass by unimproved.

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson Suggested for December 30, II Tim. 3: 14-17.

Christians who Do not Carry their Bibles Around—Neglecting to Verify Quotations in Church—How to Gain Familiarity with the Bible—Incident of a Disobedient Child—Reminiscence of Christian Work in Germany—The Comprehensiveness of the Book—A Refractery Servant—A Dressmaker Encouraged—Remarkable Conversion of a Soldier.

A SOLDIER without a sword! Such is every Christian who ventures into a religious meeting without his Bible. He is like a seaman without a chart, a traveller without a guide-book, a workman without a tool, an astronomer without a telescope, a surgeon without an instrument. It is astonishing, in numberless congregations, especially those of Nonconformists, to see hardly a Bible in the place, except that which is used by the minister! It is the custom of the Roman Catholic to carry his missal with him to church, and he is not ashamed to carry his books of devotion with him into a horse-car or a railway carriage. The churchman carries his prayer-book and Bible as well as his hymn-book to church; the churchman is

Not Ashamed of His Bible.

The Scotch Presbyterians are seen on the Sunday morning walking to church with their Bibles under their arms or in their hands; and in every religious meeting in Scotland the audience is accustomed to turn to the passages quoted by the preacher, and so to gain by every religious service in the knowledge of the Bible; the Scotchman is not ashamed of his Bible. But among English dissenters, in America, and in the Protestant countries of Europe, the use of the Bible in church is scarcely known. Why should a Lutheran, or Free Church Swiss, an English Wesleyan, Baptist, or Independent, be ashamed to carry and to use his Bible? The consequence is that the greatest ignorance of the Bible prevails; in a Bible-reading we find people looking for Revelations among the Books of Moses, and for the minor prophets among the Epistles! Numbers of men who are members of churches can find a place in a railway guide with the greatest readiness, while it would take them half an hour to discover the locality of one of the sayings of Jeremiah, or some passage in Deuteronomy!

How can I get a knowledge of my Bible? many say. By the simplest process: make use of your Bible whenever you have an opportunity; carry it to church, and, when the Lesson is read, find the place and read after the minister. When he refers to any text in his sermon, find the place, and read it, that you may remember it again. Always bring your Bible to family prayer, and follow the reader; if possible, form the good habit of reading round verse by verse, so that all may take part. Then, when any special thing occurs in your family, say a birth, a marriage, or a death, search in your Bible all which God says about it. If you are in perplexity, search what God says about perplexity; if in fear, what He says about fear; if in want, what He says about His children's needs. If a child is naughty, search what He says about a parent's training.

of seven years old was one day very naughty; he had been impertinent to his governess, and would not acknowledge his fault. After being kept in bed twelve hours, he at last yielded, and owned himself in the wrong, and then asked his mother to read him from the Bible all the directions which God has given for parents to punish their children. Happily the mother knew her Bible, and was able at once to turn to every passage. But what respect would the child have had for his mother if she had been obliged to confess she did not know these passages?

The Christian's sword exercise consists in knowing how to handle the Bible. Paul writes to Timothy as one who from a child has known the Holy Scriptures. In those days portable Bibles were out of the question; the huge parchment rolls then in use could not be carried from place to place. Timothy must have learned the Holy Scriptures by heart. But how great an advantage we have with pocket Bibles, which we can, and ought to, carry everywhere with us! Is it not rather a lazy way of listening when we do not take the trouble to compare Scripture with Scripture, and so take from God and not from the minister the truths which are being taught? Another objection is, "I am so unused to handle my Bible, that I should feel awkward." But every one is awkward in the commencement of anything that is new to him. The writer, when evangelizing in Switzerland and Germany, often held meetings in villages where the Bible was very little known. She carried a certain number of Bibles with her, and lent them to the people who occupied the first rows of seats, and exhorted all the other people to bring their own Bibles to the next meeting. DAILY VICTORY.

"And this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.—1 JOHN v. 4.

I want a present, living faith,
That I may prove each day, each hour,
Amid the toils and cares of life,
My precious Saviour's love and power;
I want, amid the petty cares
That daily worry and annoy,
To live by faith so near my God
That life shall be a constant joy.

I want a firm unwavering faith,
That bringeth good from seeming ill;
That e'en amid affliction's blast,
Rejoices in the Father's will;
That when long-cherished hope's denied,
Still sings a "glad triumphant song,"
Knowing that He who reigns on high—
A God of love—can do no wrong.

I want a faith that falters not,
Let skies be bright or tempest beat,
That 'mid earth's joys, and cares, and griefs
Victorious sits at Jesus' feet.
Give me such faith, and then I know
When I shall pass cold Jordan's wave,
The faith that kept me day by day
Will be triumphant o'er the grave,

WORKS OF J. W. KIMBALL.

How to See Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace.
256 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

Those who are familiar with the previous writings of this deeply devotional author, will gladly welcome this beautiful book. It is not an impetuous torrent of love, like "Augustine's Confessions." It is rather the calm and quiet flow of the "Imitation of Christ." He who reads it can scarcely fail to be spiritually enriched, and in very truth to "see Jesus with fulness of joy and peace."—Interior, Chicago.

Every page is fragrant with the love of Jesus. It is the best book of the kind we have read. Its sole purpose is to guide the believer into that closer communion for which he yearns, and to furnish wise counsel for a life of holiness.—Lutheran Observer.

It is full of the marrow of the gospel, presented in so simple, well illustrated, and experimental a form that even the youngest disciple can apprehend its spiritual lessons and be led by it into the richest enjoyment of the fulfillment of the promises.—Christian Advocate.

Heaven: My Father's House.
252 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

Heaven.—I have seen nothing on the subject which pleased me so much. The views are original, and I think just. Some of them I do not remember to have seen presented at all; and others not so well."—Rev. Dr. Mark Hopkins, Williams College, Mass.

"I like his way of approaching the subject. The book develops in a very pleasing manner a line of thought peculiar and untouched by any of the many who have written on it."—Rev. Prof. Samuel Harris, Yale College, Conn.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. H. B. Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.

Encouragements to Faith.
207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one specially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefitted by it."—Preface.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston Advertiser.

THE RIGHT HON. JOHN BRIGHT, THE VENERABLE STATESMAN, NOW NEARING DEATH.

THE RT. HON. JOHN BRIGHT.

Born in 1811—Espouses the Temperance Cause in His Youth—His First Public Address—Advocacy of the Claims of the Bible Society—Advancing Culture—First Election Contest in 1843—The Corn Law Agitation—Protest Against the Crimean War in 1853—Defence of the Queen in 1865—Demonstrations in Birmingham in 1883.

THE news cabled early last week that the famous statesman, who has throughout his life been the one steady and faithful friend of the United States in English public life, was lying at the point of death, has recalled to memory his many acts of friendliness to this country, and especially, how, when twenty-seven years ago, English politicians were clamoring for war with America, he alone of men of eminence stood up bravely for peace and conciliation. No man in Europe deserves more thoroughly the sympathy and good-will of our people. We therefore give his portrait, with the following details of his biography.

He was born at Greenbank, Rochdale, on November 16, 1811, and is, therefore, seventy-seven years of age. His father was the late Mr. Jacob Bright, a respected member of the Society of Friends, who by dint of sterling moral worth and business ability succeeded, notwithstanding many disadvantages, in making himself master of a cotton mill near Rochdale. He was thrice married, and had eleven children, all of whom were the offspring of his second wife. She was a woman of no common order, having a clear, well-furnished, and richly gifted mind, and a tender, loving, and Christian heart.

As a youth Mr. Bright was not without practice in public speaking. Before he was out of his teens he was regarded as an orator of considerable promise. At the age of nineteen he became a most earnest Advocate of the Temperance Cause.

It is stated that, in conjunction with some like-minded gentlemen, he was the first to introduce the subject of organized temperance to his native town in 1830. Meetings followed in neighboring villages, and it was at one of those meetings that Mr. Bright delivered his first public address. On the way to that meeting, we are told that he and his friend Mr. Oliver Ormerod recited to each other their prepared speeches, and it was arranged between them that they were to prompt each other if there was any likelihood of a breakdown. The room was crowded, and Mr. Bright, in beginning his address, was very nervous, but gained confidence as he proceeded, and delivered his maiden speech with effect, and was warmly applauded.

The Bible Society.

Amongst the most noteworthy of the early addresses of Mr. Bright, was one delivered at Rochdale at a meeting of the Bible Society. The Rev. John Aldis, an honored and distinguished Baptist minister, was staying at a friend's house when John Bright arrived to accompany him to the meeting, which was to be held in the Friends' Meeting House. "Soon," says Mr. Aldis, "a slender, modest young gentleman came, who surprised me by his intelligence and thoughtfulness. I took his arm on the way to the meeting, and I thought he seemed nervous. I think it was his first public speech—at all events in such connection. It was very eloquent and powerful, and carried away the meeting but it was elaborate and memoriter. On our way back, as I congratulated him, he said that such efforts cost him too dear, and asked me how I spoke so easily. Years rolled away. I had entirely forgotten the name of the young friend, when the Free Trade Bazaar was held in London. One of those engaged in it, calling on me, asked if I had called on Mr. Bright. I said I had not been able to attend the meetings, and did not personally know him at all. He replied, 'You must, for I heard him say that you gave him his first lesson in the art of public speaking.' I went to a subsequent meeting, and immediately recognized the young friend of 1832."

In 1833 Mr. Bright paid his first visit to the Continent. Passing over from London to Ostend, he visited Ghent, Brussels, Antwerp, Cologne, Frankfort, and Mayence. He sailed down the Rhine to Rotterdam, but was compelled by the prevalence of cholera to return to England. The visit, however, short as it was, was not lost upon his eager and observant mind. Subsequent and more prolonged visits made him the possessor of much that is most valuable in the results of European travel. Already he had decided literary tastes. He revelled in the biographies of illustrious men and in works of history. But above all, the great poets delighted him. Their far-reaching vistas of thought, their mastery of expression, their sense of the sublime and beautiful, their loftiness and tenderness, their sweetness and light, passed into his very nature and became part of his inmost being. Amidst all his other interests, whether of business, literature, or politics, John Bright never neglected his Bible, and it has been remarkable how even his political speeches in the House and elsewhere teem with Bible allusions and quotations.

His First Election Contest

took place at Durham in April, 1843, when he was unsuccessful. Four months later the seat was again vacant, and Mr. Bright, nothing daunted by his previous failure, renewed his candidature, and this time gained a decided victory. It was not long before his voice was heard in Parliament. The poor and the helpless were from the first his clients, and there can be no question that the secret of his power lay in the fact that he was utterly unselfish and thoroughly in earnest. The whole heart of John Bright was deeply moved by what he knew of the sufferings of the masses, and he was entirely convinced that the first and paramount duty of Parliament was to abolish the monopoly legalized by the Corn Laws, which was to a great extent the cause of the mischief.

But probably no part of his career was the subject of greater diversity of opinion in England than his attitude during which broke out at the close of the year 1853. There was a strong anti-Russian sentiment in England, amongst almost all classes, and a widespread feeling that Russia would have to be fought sometime if England's supremacy in India was to be maintained, and that there was no time so propitious as that. Almost alone in that great crisis, John Bright stood up to protest against what he held to be an unjustifiable war. His action on the question cost him his seat for Manchester, and made him, for the time, one of the most unpopular men in the country. At the beginning of 1856 Mr. Bright had a severe illness, the result of his public labors, which necessitated a prolonged period of rest and travel. During a subsequent visit to the Continent he had an interview with the Empress of Russia.

Defence of the Queen,

In 1866, at a great meeting in St. James's Hall, London, Mr. Ayrton, M. P., thought fit to remark upon the Queen's infrequent appearance on public occasions, after the death of her husband, and censured her Majesty for not recognizing the people when they gathered in such numbers in front of one of her palaces. Mr. Bright interposed, and repudiated the insinuation. "I am not accustomed," he said, "to stand up in defence of those who are the possessors of crowns. But I could not sit and hear that observation without a sensation of wonder and of pain. I think there has been by many persons a great injustice done to the Queen in reference to her desolate and widowed position. And I venture to say this, that a woman—be she the Queen of a great realm, or the wife of one of your laboring men—who can keep alive in her heart a great sorrow for the lost object of her life and affection is not at all likely to be wanting in a great and generous sympathy with you." Mr. Bright's manly and Christian sympathy was not forgotten in the royal palace. When his own home was darkened by the death of Mrs. Bright in 1878, and expressions of kind condolence poured in upon him from all quarters, there came among the rest a telegram from Queen Victoria, expressing her deep sympathy with him in the hour of his sorrow.

Mr. Bright at Court.

On Mr. Gladstone's accession to power in 1868, Mr. Bright accepted the Presidency of the Board of Trade; and Her Majesty, on learning his acceptance of the post, with queenly courtesy and thoughtful kindness caused it to be intimated to Mr. Bright that any court ceremony which might be opposed to his principles as a Quaker should, in his case, be entirely dispensed with, and that he need not wear the costume of blue and silver, which Cabinet members are expected to wear when they go to the palace.

On being offered Cabinet rank he said he would have preferred to remain in the common rank of the simple citizenship in which he had hitherto lived. He said: "There is a charming story contained in a verse of the Old Testament which has struck me as one of great beauty. Many of you will recollect that the prophet, in journeying to and fro, was very hospitably entertained by what is termed in the Bible

The Shunammite Woman.

In return for the hospitality of his entertainment he wished to make her some amends. and he called her and asked her what there was that he should do for her. 'Shall I speak for thee to the King, or to the Captain of the Host?'—and it has always appeared to me to be a great answer that the Shunammite woman returned. She said, 'I dwell among mine own people.' When the question was put to me whether I would step into the position in which I now find myself, the answer from my heart was the same —I wish to dwell among mine own people. Happily the time may have come—I trust it has come—when in this country an honest man may enter the service of the Crown, and at the same time may not feel it in any degree necessary to dissociate himself from his own people."

Since 1857, when he was

by an overwhelming majority, Mr. Bright has continued to represent that constituency in Parliament. To celebrate their political silver wedding, in 1883, Birmingham did honor to their popular member in a series of fêtes, processions, speeches, etc. On June 11 of that year there was a monstre procession of welcome "extending over a route fully five miles long," and composed chiefly of artisan battalions, who to the blare of numerous brass bands marched with steady tramp amid the fluttering of flags and appropriate banners. On the following day there was a great meeting in Bingley Hall, the audience numbering, at a necessarily rough estimate, over 20,000 people. At this meeting the Rev. Dr. R. W. Dale presented Mr. Bright, in the name and on behalf of Birmingham, with a silver dessert service and portrait, to an accompaniment of the most enthusiastic applause. Throughout the jubilee every class of the community participated in the festivities. The enthusiasm that was kept up throughout the week was as spontaneous as it was generous. The significance of this mighty outburst of popular feeling lay in the character of the great Englishman who raised it. He had fought the battle of the public unselfishly; he had not scrupled to brave unpopularity when it appeared to him that the public were being led in the wrong direction; and he always presented to the world the white flower of a blameless life.

"Be just and fear not" is the motto which John Bright adopted in preference to all others, and which he has honestly lived up to at every moment of his life. And it may unquestionably be said of him that his justice and fearlessness have won the respect of the civilized world.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Jamie the Idiot's Discovery.—A Poor Highland lad in the north was one night converted to Christ, and the next morning, with hands and face well washed and shining, he set out for the meeting which was to be held. His clothes were in tatters, but he was unusually clean. Soon his unwonted appearance attracted the attention of the school children, who flocked after him, shouting, "You're braw this morning, Jamie; you're braw this morning." Turning to them Jamie replied, "Aye, He was braw Himself that morning He rose from the dead." That half idiot, on the night before, had recognized that simply taking God at His word and accepting Christ as his Saviour, he had passed from the deadness of sin into the glorious life of redeemed freedom.

"No Fanatics in Our Church."—The Rev. W. Haslam one day, in the course of conversation with a clergyman, remarked: "You have been praying for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Now, if the Holy Spirit did settle on your church, and some of your congregation began to make evident manifestations of it, what would you do?" "Turn them all out," was his quick response, "turn them all out at once; we would not have any fanatics in our church." Such is the attitude of many Christian churches in this day. They pray for what they do not wish, and which, if they did obtain, they would get rid of as quickly as possible. With them Christianity is fast becoming a mere ceremonial. It is not this ceremonialism we would offer sinners, but a living, risen, glorious Saviour, who died for sinners, and rose again.

Extricated from a Slough.—Mr. Thompson said: "I remember the first time that God showed me that I was a sinner—that a good, respectable, church-going young man was nevertheless in God's eyes a sinner. My friends all laughed at me, and said surely I was going crazy; but the Holy Spirit had given me a glimpse of myself in God's looking-glass, and there I saw myself in my true colors. I strove after salvation with all my might, I prayed as I had never prayed before, yet all the time I did not see that God was standing, holding out this salvation for my acceptance. To add to my despondency, my friends told me that I could not be saved for six weeks; for that time at least I would require to repent and humble myself before God; then, perhaps, in His grace, He would lift me out of the slough of despond. But, praise His name, He showed me that it did not take six days to be converted, but that at once, if I came to Him, ceasing from my own struggles after righteousness, and trusting in the finished work of Christ, I might have Him as my Saviour. The work was done. There is no regulation time of repentance, there is no time of penance, during which the sinner tones down the glaringness of his sin. Christ invites the sinner to come to Him, 'now,' just as he is."

A Dress-piece in the Contribution Plate.—A Scotch evangelist said; "In a town in the north of Scotland they had been having missionary services, in which the duty of giving to Foreign Mission schemes was urgently pressed upon the people. The meetings were continued for several nights, and on the last night there was to be a special collection. The address was closed, and the collection plates were being passed round, the people contributing as the Lord enabled them; but when one plate had almost gone its round, it received rather an unusual contribution. A young lady took from underneath her plaid a rather bulky parcel, and handing it to the usher, said, 'I have nothing else but this to offer.' On examination it proved to be a piece of cloth, which the girl had purchased to make a dress, but the stories of the heathen dying without the Gospel had so touched her heart that she determined she must give something. But all her pocket-money was spent; what could she give? Mentally she examined all her possessions. There was the cloth for her new dress; could she give that? It was a struggle to part with it, but she must do something to show her love for Christ, and so that bulky contribution found its way into the collection. It is our duty, if we cannot go ourselves to preach the Gospel of Christ's salvation to the heathen, to help to sustain those who are able and willing to devote their lives to that purpose."

THE USES OF PROPHECY.

By John Urquhart.

Why the Study of Prophecy is Neglected—Predictions of Christ's First Coming Misunderstood—Neglect of Prophecy Involves Unpreparedness for His Second Coming—The Kingdom Will not Come by Evangelization—Necessary as a Testimony—Neither Experience nor Promise of Triumph—The Hope of the Early Church—Signs of Christ's Approach.

MANY persons are quite of the opinion that Revelation either finds a man mad, or makes him mad, and they have what seems to them a wholesome dread of prophetic studies. I have no desire to conceal the difficulties which abound in the pathway of those who explore this domain, or to deny that deplorable mistakes have been often made—mistakes which have brought the study of prophecy into undeserved contempt. But it may be well to ask whether, in putting aside all consideration of these things, we are not robbing ourselves of the very highest power.

The predictions regarding Christ's first coming were obscure enough to the Jews. There was much that they could not reconcile, and we know that they made mistakes. But they, nevertheless, laid hold of a mighty truth, or rather that truth laid hold of them. They and each line they read, and each text they studied—no matter how dark it was—deepened that conviction. If they had said: "No man can understand these things fully. They lead to endless theories, and the absurdest dreams," and if, in consequence, they had treated the Prophets as a sealed book, then all that power would have been lost to them. The sense of that mighty destiny would no longer have held them, and separated them from the peoples of the earth.

Are we, then, losing nothing through neglect? We desire that this good, to which we look onward, should make its appeal to us. We have entreated that it might hold us, and separate us for itself. But how can it do so if we turn away from God when He would speak with us regarding it? It would appear as if our Lord, foreseeing the discredit which would be cast upon this branch of Divine teaching, had specially warned us against the danger of neglecting it. This is the only Book of Scripture which has a special Promise Attached to its Study.

A blessing is to rest upon him that readeth, and upon them that hear. We accomplish the Lord's will, therefore, not by turning away from this book, but by turning to it, however deep our consciousness may be of inability to penetrate its mysteries.

The predictions regarding Jesus, with which the Bible teems, are as yet only half-fulfilled. They speak of His birth, His humiliation, His suffering and atoning death, His victory over the grave, but they do not end there. All His enemies are to be put under His feet. Iniquity is to be judged and cast out. The world is to be covered with the knowledge of God as the waters cover the sea. The prayer which the Lord taught us to offer shall then be fulfilled. God's kingdom will have come: His will shall be done on this sin-stained earth even as it is done in heaven.

Some have imagined that all this is to be accomplished through the preaching of the Gospel. We cannot limit the Spirit's power; but those who indulge this hope should ask themselves on what it is based. If it is entertained on the ground of experience, the past certainly encourages no hope of such a future as the result of evangelization alone. But if the hope is founded upon the promises of Scripture, there are some passages which have surely not been pondered. He who bids us to carry the message of peace to earth's furthest bounds and preach the Gospel to every creature, has told us that it is for "a testimony" to them. Mercy runs before the car of judgment. Before Christ comes to visit for the earth's iniquity, "this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in the whole world for a testimony unto all the nations; and then shall the end come." (Matt. 24: 14.) There is there that to the end there will be rejection as well as acceptance of our message. Then we have distinct predictions that in the last days there is trouble in store for the Church, and not triumph. They who hold the strength of the nations will make a final attempt to resist the Divine decree. The thrones of to-day will be swept away forever from the earth which they have so long saturated with blood. Their guilt will mould their punishment. As they have risen in blood, so will they go down in blood.

Man's sin will thus pave the way for God's triumph. The earth, so long and so deeply defiled by sin, shall be made glorious by righteousness. The place where God has been so terribly forgotten shall resound with His unceasing praise. We know how in which He shall see, even here upon the earth, of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied, was the hope of the early Church. They strengthened one another with the assurance that it was at hand. They looked on to that as the great event in the world's history, and they rejoiced in the conviction that it was nigh—even at the doors. They were not the victims of an amiable and salutary delusion. They knew that much must happen ere then. Paul warned the Thessalonians, in one of the first Epistles which he wrote, that the day of the Lord should not come till the apostasy had taken place, and the man of sin had been revealed.

And yet, though much had to transpire ere the Lord should come, that coming of the Lord, which was the one grand event of the future for which they waited, and which every hour was bringing nearer, that event so overtopped every other that they ever thought and spoke of it as at hand. The mighty mountain, as one has said, though far away in point of space, is ever nigh by reason of its very greatness. Or, say that we are expecting the arrival of a much-loved and long-absent friend. He is to come by a certain way, and on the far distant rising ground we have marked what seems to be his approach. From that moment, distant though he is, there is for us but one event—His coming. There are various nearer objects of the deepest interest for those around us; they have little or none for us, because he is near. The nearer He comes the more absolute is His hold of our heart and mind.

And the Lord comes—the Son of God, who loved us, and gave Himself for us. We have marked His approach;

We Know that He is Nigh.

The Scripture spoke of the apostasy which should precede His coming; it has taken place. This book has described the great harlot, whose seat was to be Imperial Rome, the city of the seven hills: she has appeared. It speaks of a false prophet, who should also delude the nations of the earth: he, too, has been manifested. The Revelation of the Old Testament—the Book of Daniel—predicts that the one Empire of Rome should be broken up into ten kingdoms, and that "in the days of these kings" the kingdom of God should be established. The Roman Empire has been divided, and these ten kingdoms are with us now almost in their completeness. How can we fail to note the Lord's approach? What interest is able to compete with that excited by the thought that the Desire of all nations draws nigh? How can we fail to hear, and to be thrilled by the cry, which was never louder than it is to-day: "Behold the Bridegroom cometh! Go ye forth to meet Him!"

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1888.

ALTHOUGH the close of one year and the beginning of another are not with us, as they were with God's chosen people, associated with momentous events or commemorative of epochal deliverances, the fact that we are passing one more milestone in our national and individual life suggests retrospective consideration. The year which has passed over us since we last stood at the annual dividing line in our journey of life has not left us as we were then. We have moved backward or forward as the days have flown by, and our souls are either stronger and purer, or weaker and more sin-burdened than at the beginning of the year. Numerous opportunities of service have been afforded us; have we used them with the zeal which we promised when we entered the service of the Master? Our national life—has that been higher, more righteous, more in accord with Christian principles, than former years? And have we individually done our part as Christian citizens to make it so? It is well that in passing these annual milestones we sit down for a brief period and look back, so that we may learn the lessons the past may teach, and go forward with chastened souls, taught by experience our own weakness, and clinging more closely to the One and only Source of all strength.

Our Political Life

as a nation, during the year now drawing to a close, has been one of intense struggle and agitation. The decisive stand taken by the President, in December, 1887, on the subject of the tariff, and his insistance that, in extensive reductions of our customs duties, the way would be opened for the removal of dangerous anomalies, and one means of solving difficult political and social problems of the day, placed an issue before the people which, as every one recognized, would be momentous for himself and his party. The Presidential campaign was fought mainly on that issue. Other considerations doubtless had their weight. Many citizens were too busy to give the difficult question an exhaustive study, or they were influenced by party loyalty, or by their position and circumstances, in deciding on which side they should cast their votes; but the public discussion—and that was matter for thankfulness—was devoted, not to personal abuse and private scandal, but to the bearings of a great and momentous question of national policy. We all know how the people decided the question. The Republican party, pledged to the maintenance of protection for home industries, was called back to office, and in March next will resume its grasp on the helm of the ship of state. This is a matter for rejoicing to one half of the nation; the other half bows loyally to the decision, and should pray to the God of nations that the men who will guide the national course during the next four years may themselves be guided of Him.

As is usually the case in years of presidential elections, Congress has effected but a small amount of practical work. There has also been a hindrance to progress, in the fact of the Senate being controlled by one party, while the House was controlled by the opposite party. In the tariff debate this was especially conspicuous. The Mills Bill, which passed the House, was scarcely debated in the Senate, and a substitute, which is not yet perfected, was prepared in its place. It is not greatly to the credit of the legislative body that the two branches, while differing so widely on political questions, found little difficulty in agreeing to pass a River and Harbor Bill of more than twenty million dollars, a large part of which will, as usual, be devoted to party rather than national advantage. The conflict of parties had a still more disagreeable result in the Fisheries Dispute with Canada. There was an evident disposition on the part of Great Britain and Canada to effect a permanent settlement of this vexed question. The treaty effected by the commissioners for the purpose was, however, summarily rejected, when by a more conciliatory policy it might have been so modified as to be mutually satisfactory to both nations. The dismissal of Lord Sackville, the British Minister, was another act of a similar character, for which the President was responsible. The Minister's own blunder could not be ignored, but it might wisely have been treated in a more dignified and courteous manner.

The Social Events of the year have been chiefly of local importance, though it is gratifying to notice the growing disposition of the whole country to sympathize with and aid any section that may be under suffering. This disposition was manifested during the prevalence of yellow fever at Jacksonville, Fla., which during the months of August and September made that city a scene of desolation. There were about four thousand seizures, and nearly four hundred persons died. Business was entirely suspended, and private benevolence, assisted by a grant from the Federal Government, were needed by the afflicted people. That help was cheerfully given. The severity of the weather was a memorable feature of the early months of the year. In the Northwest a fierce blizzard, especially severe in Dakota, caused the loss of over two hundred lives in February, and in March New York was visited by the most terrible storm within the memory of its citizens. For two days traffic was entirely suspended, communication with other cities was cut off by the destruction of telegraph apparatus, and many persons lost their lives. Labor troubles, as usual of late years, caused much distress in several sections. The strike in Pennsylvania of the miners in the Reading collieries threw 30,000 men and boys out of employment, and when the engineers and switchmen on the Burlington Railroad came to their aid by refusing to carry coal mined by the men who had taken the place of the strikers, the area of the trouble was largely increased. Another distressing struggle was that of the car drivers in Chicago, which resulted in conflicts with the police and the loss of several lives.

In Foreign Lands,

notably in Germany, the year will be a memorable one. On March 9 died the venerable Emperor William I., whose long life and reign have been one of the most remarkable periods of national history. The aged monarch had lived to see the dream of national unity realized, his home policy, so stubbornly maintained, justified by events, and the historic foes of his country, who were triumphant in his youth, defeated and humiliated in his latter days. William died, and his son Frederick III. succeeded him. During his short reign of three months the world saw signs of the liberal policy which would have guided him had his life been prolonged, and joined with Germany in mourning when on June 15 he passed away. William II., the new Emperor, has shown no disposition to tread in his father's footsteps, but is evidently possessed with the exploded notions of the divine right of kings to which his grandfather was wedded. In France the Republic has not strengthened its hold on the country during the year. The utter absence of any statesman of commanding ability has given prominence to the farcial General Boulanger, who by dexterously encouraging the hopes of Imperialists, Royalists, and the middle classes, appears to be gaining a power that menaces the very existence of the Republic, and leads to the impression that a dictatorship like that of the first Napoleon may once more overthrow liberty in France.

In Great Britain the affairs of Ireland have again been the most prominent subject of public interest. The operation of the Coercion Law, and the policy of the landlords have caused much suffering among the Irish people, though there has been a marked decrease in the number of agrarian outrages, and less bloodshed than in former years. The deeply interesting inquiry, now being prosecuted, into the conduct of the National League promises to settle the vexed question of its responsibility for crime. Mr. Parnell asked for the Commission, thus challenging inquiry into the charges which the leading English newspaper persistently brought against him and his colleagues, of encouraging crime, hiring and rewarding criminals, and abetting, aiding, and concealing murders and outrages. This inquiry will be closely watched, not only across the Atlantic, but among the friends of Ireland here, who, while sympathizing with the Irish people, have too much respect for law and order to support men against whom charges such as those made by the Times can be proved.

Students of prophecy surveying the condition of the whole of Europe, cannot fail to be impressed with the fact that, though the year has been one of general peace, there are below the surface numerous signs that it is like the hush that precedes the storm. While there has been no war, while there are no stirring questions out of which war seems likely to arise, every country is making active preparations for war. In Germany, in Russia, in Austria, in Italy, and even in England, military measures, looking to increased strength and efficiency of the armies, are devised and executed. With the prescience which knowledge of international affairs gives to statesmen, they are preparing for the conflict which students of prophecy believe will shortly convulse the world.

The Religious Life

of the year, both at home and across the Atlantic, has been of that awakened character which prophecy indicated as a characteristic of the last days. Even among those who do not believe that the time for Christian work is short, there has been a notable increase of energy and endeavors to promote organized and united aggressive labor for Christ. It has been a year of great conventions. The International Missionary Conference in London, the Pan Presbyterian Council, the great gathering of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Quadrennial Methodist Episcopal Conference, and many other assemblies have met, and in all of them the one engrossing subject has been, how most effectively to get the gospel preached in professedly Christian lands and in heathen countries as a testimony to all men. Thus a supreme effort is being made to spread the knowledge of Christ over the whole world with an energy and devotedness that the Church as a whole has never manifested before, and which is a sign of the Holy Spirit's work in preparing the way for the Second Coming of Christ by the gathering out of all nations a people for Him.

The Disasters

of the year have been neither so numerous nor so fatal as in some recent years. Among the shipwrecks the most disastrous was that of the collision between the Thingvalla and the Geiser, off the coast of Nova Scotia, on August 14, in which 118 persons lost their lives. A few days later there was another collision at the Golden Gate between the City of Chester and the Oceanic, in which twenty lives were lost. On the railroads, the Haverhill disaster on January 10, the Blackshear, Ga., accident on March 17, the Orange Court House, Va., wreck on May 12, and the Mud Run, Penn., collision on May 10, were the most fatal. Three appalling calamities, which occurred in China, presented a record not easily realized in other lands. They were the inundation of the Yellow River, by which over 100,000 persons perished, and nearly 2,000,000 were rendered destitute; the breaking of an embankment, causing the death of 4,000 persons; and the flood of the Canton River, in which over 2,000 persons died.

The Obituary

list of the year, apart from the names of the two Emperors of Germany already mentioned, contains few names of the first importance. Among the most prominent are General Sheridan, Professor Asa Gray; W. W. Corcoran, the Washington philanthropist; Amos Bronson Alcott, and his famous daughter, Louisa May Alcott; Henry Bergh, the friend of the brute creation in New York; Chief-Justice Waite; Matthew Arnold, the English critic; ex-Senator Conkling, Dr. James Freeman Clark; E. P. Roe, the novelist; Bishop Harris, Professor Proctor, P. H. Gosse, and Marshal Bazaine.

A BAD BOIL CURED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday, December 23, 1888.

"I have heard thy prayer; . . . behold I will heal thee . . . And Isaiah said: Take a lump of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered." II Kings 20: 5, 7.

LUXURIOUS living is not healthy. The second generation of kings and queens and lords and princes is apt to be brainless and invalid. The second crop of grass is almost always short. Royal blood is generally scrofulous. You will not be surprised, then, to hear that King Hezekiah had disorders which broke out in a carbuncle, virulent and deathful. The Lord told him he must die; he did not want to die. He turned his face to the wall, so that his prayer would not be interrupted, and cried for his life.

God Heard the Prayer, and answered it, saying, "Behold, I will heal thee." But there was human instrumentality to be employed. This carbuncle needed a "cataplasm," which is a poultice. Your old mother, who doctored her own children in the time when physicians were not as plenty as they are now, will tell you that the very best poultice is a fig, and that was what was used upon the carbuncle of King Hezekiah. The power of God, accompanied by this human instrumentality, cured the king.

In this age of discovery, when men know so much it almost kills them, and write so wisely it almost kills us, it has been found out that prayer to God is a dead failure. All things are arranged according to inexorable law. There is no use in praying to God for rain in time of drought. The "weather probabilities" in the morning papers will decide the question, rain or no rain, and the whole nation in prayer before God would not bring down a single drop. I am not now speaking of an imaginary theory, but of that which is believed by ten thousand times ten thousand men.

If sickness comes to your household, it will depend entirely upon ventilation, good diet, and the skill of the doctors, as to whether your child gets well. The father might pray all day, and the mother might pray all night—it would not have any effect upon the case. If squills, belladonna, paregoric, and gruel do the work, your child will get well; if not, not. There is a cast-iron God seated at the head of the universe, holding in the cold grasp of His metal fingers a band of law from which nothing can break away.

The Battle-Ground.

Men and women of God, at this point the great battle of Christianity is to be fought. The great foe of Christianity to-day is rationalism, that comes out from our schools and universities, and magazines and newspapers, to scoff at Bible truth and caricature the old religion of Jesus. It says Jesus is not God, for it is impossible to explain how He can be divine and human at the same time. The Bible is not inspired, for there are things in it that they don't like. Regeneration is a farce; there is good enough in us, and the only thing is to bring it out. Development is the word—development. The Garden of Eden is a fairy story, and no more to be believed than the Arabian Nights, or Gulliver's Travels, or Robinson Crusoe. We all started as baboons, and are blood relations to that monkey squirming about on the top of that hand-organ. Lazarus was not dead when Christ pretended to raise him; he was only playing dead. The water was not changed into wine at the wedding, but Christ brought in some wine that he had found elsewhere to make up the deficiency. Christ did not walk on the sea, but on the shore, so near that it seemed as if he really was on the water.

What is still more alarming is, that Christian men dare not meet this ridicule. There is not one Christian man in five that can, unblanched, stand in the presence of all this raillery, saying:

"I Believe In The Whole Bible, and in every single statement that it makes." Christian men try to soften the Bible down to suit the sceptics. The sceptics sneer at the dividing of the Red Sea; and the Christian goes to explaining that the wind blew a hurricane from one direction a good while, until all the water piled up; and besides, that it was low water anyhow, and so the Israelites went through without any trouble. Why not be frank and say: "I believe the Lord God Almighty came to the brink of the Red Sea, and with his right arm swung back the billows on the right side, and with his left arm swung back the billows on the left side, and the abashed water stood up hundreds of feet high; while through their glassy wall the sea-monsters gazed with affrighted eyes on the passing Israelites"?

The rationalist comes to you saying: "How about Jonah and the whale? Do you really believe that fish story?" There were never so many Nantucket fishermen after one whale as there have been rationalists flinging harpoons at the Mediterranean sea-monster, and from that one whale they have got enough oil to light ten thousand souls to perdition. A sceptic tells you that Jonah would have been killed in the process of swallowing, and that he could not, anyhow, have lived three days in such close quarters, but would have been smothered by the poor ventilation. How the good Christians immediately go to work, and try to explain the whole thing by natural laws, so as and say that a whale is an air-breathing fish; that every little while it comes to the surface, and that the whale that swallowed Jonah did the same thing, and thus got a supply for itself and for the prophet. Why not rather say that God can do anything; and He could take Jonah through the whale's throat, although the throat would not have been half large enough ordinarily to let him pass, and could have kept him alive in the whale five years without any air, if He had chosen to? Who made the whale? God. Who made Jonah? God. Then He could do anything He pleased with either of them.

The moment you begin to explain away the miraculous and supernatural, you surrender the Bible. Take the supernatural out of the Bible, and you make it a collection of lies and humbugs, in preference to which I choose Æsop's Fables. They are what they pretend to be—fables. But if, after all that the Bible declares, Jesus is not God, and Lazarus was not raised from the dead, and the water was not turned into wine, and the Red Sea was not divided, and in answer to prayer Hezekiah's boil did not get well, then the Bible is the worst fraud ever perpetrated in God's universe.

Ah! my friends, have we been mistaken? Does God hear and answer prayer, or does he not? Hezekiah was sick unto death; he prayed for his life; God heard him, and added fifteen years to that lifetime.

The Prayer Saved Him

the lump of figs applied being merely the God-appointed human instrumentality.

"But," says some one, "I don't believe the Bible." Ah! then we will have to part company for four or five minutes, for it is useless to try to argue with any man with whom you cannot stand upon common ground. In any argument, if you would be successful, there must be some common data to start from. It is foolish to try to prove to a man that twice three are six, provided he does not admit the multiplication table, or that two and two are four, if he does not admit the addition table.

My first address, therefore, is to those who do believe in the Bible. I want to tell you that prayer is and that the allopathic and homeopathic, and the eclectic schools will yet acknowledge it. Here are two cases of sickness precisely alike: the same kind of medicine is given to both of them, and in the same quantities. The one patient recovers, and the other does not. Why? God blesses the one remedy, and does not bless the other. Prayer has helped many a blundering doctor through with a case that would have otherwise become completely unmanageable. There is such a thing as Gospel hygiene, as Christian pharmacy, as divine materia medica. That is a foolish man who, in case of sickness, goes only to human resources, when we have these instances of the Lord's help in the sick-room. Before you call the doctor, while he is there, and after he goes away, look up to Him who cured Hezekiah. Let the apothecary send the poultice, but God makes it draw. Oh! I am glad to have a doctor who knows how to pray. God send salvation to all the doctors! Sickness would be oftener balked, death would be oftener hurled back from the door-sill, if medical men came into the sick-room, like Isaiah of the text, with a prescription in their hands, and the word of the Lord in their mouths.

John Abercrombie, the most celebrated physician of Scotland, prayed when he went into the sick-room, and he wrote no more ably about "diseases of the brain" than about "the philosophy of the moral feelings." I don't know how much of the of Sydenham and Cooper and Harvey and Rush depended upon the fact that they knew how to pray as well as to prescribe. I don't want a physician who sees no God in human anatomy to doctor my broken bones. If God made us (and I think He did), and if the Bible is true (and I am rather disposed to think it is), then it is not strange that prayer does traverse natural cause; ay, that it introduces a new cause. When God made the law, he did not make it so strong He could not break it. If God made our bodies, when they are broken He is the one to mend them; and it is reasonable that we should call Him in to do it. If my furnace in the cellar breaks down, there is no one so competent to repair it as the manufacturer. If my watch stops, there is no one so competent to set it going as the one who made it. If the body is disordered, call in the Maker of it. It is not all, as these physicists tell us, a matter of ventilation, or poisoned air, of cleanliness or dirt, of nutritious diet or poor fare. I have known people to get well in rooms where the windows had been six weeks down, tight shut, and I have known them to die right under patent ventilators. I have known children sickly who every day had their bath, and I have known children robust, the washing of whose faces would make their features unrecognizable.

God did not make the law and then run away from it. What is law of nature? It is only God's Usual Way of Doing Things.

But He has said that if His children ask Him to do a thing, and He can consistently do it, He will do it. Go on with your pills and plasters and nostrums and elixirs, and your catholicon, but remember that the mightiest agency in your recovery is prayer. Prayer to God brought the king's cure, the lump of figs being the God-directed human instrumentality.

I would have you also see—for it is another lesson of the subject—that our prayer must also be accompanied by means. It is an outrage to ask God to do a thing while we sit indolent. The prayer, to be acceptable, must come not only from the heart, but from the hands. We must devotion and work going together. Luther came to Melancthon's bedside and prayed for his recovery, and insisted, at the same time, that he should take some warm soup, the soup being just as important as the prayer. In the time of the great plague that came to York, in England, the priests prayed all night and all day for the removal of the plague, but did not think of clearing out the dead dogs and cats that lay in the gutters, causing the sickness. We must use means as well as supplication. If a man has "evening prayers," asking for health, and then sits down to a full supper of indigestibles at 11 o'clock at night, his prayer is a mockery. A farmer has no right to pray for the safety of his family when he knows there is no cover on the cistern. The Christian man, reckless about his health, ought not to expect the same answer to his prayer as the Christian man expects who retires regularly at 10 o'clock at night, and takes his morning bath with the appendix of a Turkish towel. Paul said to the passengers of the Alexandrian corn ship that they should get safe ashore, but he told them they must use means, and that was: "Stick to the old ship!" God is not weak, needing our help, but God is strong, and asks us to co-operate with Him, that we may be strong, too. Pray by all means, but don't forget the fig-poultice.

That God answers prayers offered in the right spirit, seconded by our own effort, is the first and the last lesson of this text, and it is a lesson that this age needs to learn. If all communication between heaven and earth is cut off, let us know it. If all the Christian prayers that are going up toward God never reach Him, then, I say, let silence smite the lips of the afflicted world, and the nations smother their groans and die quietly.

God Does Answer Prayer.

The text shows it. You say: "I don't believe the Bible; I think that those things were merely coincidences, which are often brought as answers to prayer." Do you say that? Was it mere happen-so that Elijah prayed for rain just as the rain was going to come anyhow? Did Daniel pray in the wild beasts' den just at the time when all the lions happened to have lockjaw? Did Jesus pray at the grave of Lazarus just at the time when Lazarus was going to dress himself and come out anyhow? Did Jesus lose His place in His sermon, and make a mistake, when He said: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you"? And, lest some were so stupid that they could not understand it, He goes on: "For everyone that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened."

But some one persists in saying: "I don't believe anything of the Bible." Then I appeal to

Your Own Instincts.

Prayer in certain circumstances is as natural to man as the throbbing in the pulse, as the respiration of the lungs. Put a company of men—I don't care how bad they are—in some imminent peril, and they will cry out: "God have mercy on us!" I challenge that these men who don't believe in prayer charter a steamer, go out in the "Narrows," swing out eight or nine hundred miles to sea, and then heave to and wait for a cyclone. And after the cyclone comes and the vessel has gone under ten times, when they did not expect it would rise again, and the bulwarks have been knocked in, and the masts are gone—if they do not pray, I will surrender my theory. Do you tell me that this instinct which God has put in us, He put there just to mock us for His own cruel amusement? If God implanted that instinct in the human heart, it was because in His own heart there was something responsive.

To prove that God does hear prayer, I put on the witness-stand Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Micah, John, Paul, Peter, and King Hezekiah. Tell me, ye ancient battle-fields, ye Oriental threshing-floors, ye Judean corn-fields, ye Galilean fishing-smacks, is God deaf and dumb and blind before all human petition? That God answers prayer, I bring the to prove. There has never paper enough come out of the paper-mills to write the story. Has not many a mother prayed back her bad boy from the ends of the earth—from Canton, from Madras, from Constantinople—until he knelt beside her in the old homestead? Have there not been desperadoes and renegades who have looked into the door of a prayer-meeting to laugh and scoff at it, who have been drawn by the power of prayer, until they ran to the altar crying out for mercy? Did not the blacksmith in Lyons, N. Y., pray to God until there came a great awakening that shook the community.

In My Parish

in Philadelphia one night, at a meeting, I asked a young man to go into a room at the side of the church, and talk upon the theme of religion. He grew violently angry, and shook his fists at me. We resolved to pray for that young man, and we prayed that he might yield his soul to God. And when, next night, at the meeting, the side-door was flung open, he was the first to step in. Prayer had captured him. I had a classmate in college, whose uncle, Dr. John Scudder, of India, wrote to him, saying: "I will pray for you every day until such a day, and then I will give my attention to some other subject." The last day of these prayers, when they had all gathered up before the throne of God, my classmate surrendered his soul to Jesus. This is no second-hand story. I saw the letter, and I knew the young man.

But why should I go so far? I have had in my own experience, and I have had in the history of my own family the evidence that God answers prayer. My mother, with three Christian women, assembled week after week, and prayed for their children; they kept up that prayer-meeting of four persons year after year. The world knew nothing of it. God answered all those prayers. All the group came in; the eleven sons and daughters of my mother, myself the last.

Sickness Came to my Household

—hopeless sickness, as it seemed to many. At 3 o'clock on Saturday afternoon the invalid was carried to the steamer for Savannah. At 11 o'clock the next day, being Sunday, standing in this very place, a man of God prayed for the recovery of the sick one. At that time, 11 o'clock, she who had been prostrated three weeks, with some help, walked up on deck. The occurrence was as near to being miraculous as I can imagine. That she was hopelessly sick, people who sat up with her night after night, and are here, can testify. That the prayer for her recovery was offered in this pulpit, thousands of people could testify. That at 11 o'clock on that Sunday morning she walked up on deck, as by a miraculous recovery, I call the passengers on the San Jacinto, commanded by Captain Atkins, December 16, to testify. This is no second-hand story.

Prayer impotent! If I dared to think there was no force in prayer, methinks God, after all he has done for me and mine, would strike me dead. Prayer impotent! Why, it is the mightiest force in the universe. Lightning has no speed, the Alpine avalanche has no power, compared with it.

Praying Heroes.

Will you let the abstractions and the vagaries of a few sceptics, or a good many sceptics, stand beside the experience of General Havelock, who came out in front of the English army, lifted his hat, and called upon the Lord Almighty? or of George Washington, who at Valley Forge was found upon his knees in prayer? or of William Wilberforce, who went from the British Parliament to the closet of devotion? or of Latimer, who stood with his hands on fire, in martyrdom, praying for his persecutors? Was Washington weak? Was Havelock weak? Was Wilberforce weak? Was Latimer weak? Bring all the affairs of your store, of your soul, of your body, of your friends, of your church, before Him, and the great day of eternity will show you that the best investments you ever made were your prayers, and though you may have broken promises you made to God, God never broke His promises to you. Let God be true, though every man be found a liar.

And now, in conclusion, I have to present you some cheques, of heaven, written in blood, and signed by the hand wounded on the cross. It is not safe for you to give a blank cheque with your name to it. You do not know what might be written above. But here is a blank cheque which God says I can give you; it is signed by the handwriting of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you can fill it up with anything you want to. "Ask and it shall be given to you; seek, and ye shall find." I do not say that your prayer will be answered in just the way you expect, but I do say it will be answered in the best way. Oh! will you test Him? This is the outcome of all this subject.

Blank Cheques on the Bank

If I should ask the men and women in this audience who have found God a prayer-answering God to rise up, you would nearly all rise up. In time of darkness and trouble, as in time of light and prosperity, He answered you. I commend you to that God to whom your parents dedicated you in infancy. They believed so much in prayer that their last word was a supplication for you. Having heard you in days of prosperity, He will not reject your last petition when, in the darkened room, after they have wiped the dew of death from your brow, and the whole group of loved ones have kissed you good-bye, you have only strength enough left to pray, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!"

THE BURNING QUESTION

of the day, which is disturbing churches and causing many to lose their hold of faith in miracles and in the Bible itself, was touched by the new Bishop of Manchester, England, in his first sermon, in a way that shows how valuable will be his influence in meeting the rationalistic tendencies of a section of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Bishop said: "The basis of faith was true humility. He had met many infidels, to his sorrow, but had never met with a blaspheming infidel who was not characterized by an exceptional and even ludicrous self-conceit, and he believed that this self-conceit and too great self-confidence was the besetting sin of our time, and especially of some—he did not say all—of the science of our time. The gifts of science to man within the last fifty years had been so numerous and valuable, that a certain amount of exulting self-confidence was natural and allowable, but they must remember that it was always dangerous; and sometimes productive of most disastrous consequences. For instance, there were men who, because they had been able to trace the reality of some of the phenomena which were within the reach of our apprehension, said that men should not be called upon to believe anything but what they could understand. That was dead in the teeth of all the conclusions of a sound reason. We could only know the real as it appeared to us when it had passed through the forms of our own mind, when it had been changed in the manufactory of our own sensations and perception, and we could never know the real as it was, and yet we were obliged to assume that it is. Yet in the teeth of that incontestable conclusion of sound human reason there were men who told them—men who claimed to be leaders of thought—that they ought to believe nothing which they could not understand. He exhorted them to beware of intellectual pride—of intellectual pride which came of insufficient thought If they followed reason loyally she would lead them to the very brink of that world of the real, where, handing over the torch of guidance to the grasp of faith, she left them to be led by that heavenly guide into the glorious presence of God. Reason demanded a God, faith affirmed a God, Jesus Christ revealed a God, the God and Father of Him who as on Easter morning rose from the dead and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

THE MISSION OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for January 6, 1889. Mark 1: 1-11. Golden Text, verse 3.

The Preparatory Voice—Not the Original Word A Fruitful Source of Pride and Heresy—A Servant to a Message—In the Desert—An Unpromising Sphere—Christian Work Not a Refuge for the Discontented—A Man of Simple Food and Attire—Souls Drawn to his Preaching—The Power that Induces Confession—The Twofold Baptism of Jesus.

THE mission of John the Baptist was foretold more than seven hundred years before his birth. Isaiah wrote, "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God." (Isa. 40: 3.) It was his own testimony to himself "when the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him, Who art thou? that we may give an answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?" "I am a voice." "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias."

The Voice of One.

Then he was not that One whose voice he was. All his life, all his being, all his work, pointed to Another. Jesus was the Word, John was the voice. The very existence of the blessed Jesus was in itself a message, a word from God, but John lived to be His medium of communication with man, just as a voice can convey any sound. John did not profess to be an original, but only a messenger: "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John." (John 1: 6.) There never can be another Word of God. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." (John 1: 1.) Many of the heresies of the present day arise from teachers falling into spiritual pride, and leaving the humble position of a voice, ready to speak out what God has already given in His Word. They are tempted to consider themselves as singular favorites of God, to whom He communicates revelations over and above His Word: and this lays them open to "seducing spirits and teachings of demons." (see Greek, 1 Tim. 4: 1.) If any will be wise above that which is written, he is in danger. Paul says to the Galatians: "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." (Gal. 1: 8.) Paul was content with the written Word; John was the servant of the living Word. Both of them took the place of nothingness. One said of Jesus, "He must increase, but I must decrease"; the other said he was "less than the least of all saints." (Eph. 3: 8.) Yet both were called, not as mechanical and involuntary, but as intelligent and voluntary instruments to convey to man the messages of God. This is the precious, glorious privilege of every true Christian worker—to be a voice for God, His messenger, His sent one.

There are some Christian workers who see and accept the privilege of being

Servants to Their Message,

They lend themselves, yield themselves, to it and its requirements; the message masters them, convicts, transforms them; such a worker was John the Baptist. Had he made use of his power to preach, in order to obtain a reputation for eloquence, he would have found some other sphere than the wilderness. He would probably have come into Jerusalem, and taken every opportunity to speak in the synagogues; but John waited for orders from above. He no more dreamt of directing his own steps than does a servant who has engaged himself to carry out his master's will. Some impelling power of the Holy Ghost, who filled him "even from his mother's womb" (Luke 1: 15), led him, even as a child, to desire solitude, and "he was in the deserts until the day of his showing unto Israel." Luke 1: 80.) There, in the desert, where no doubt his occupation was communion with God and much prayer for the state of his people, the word of God came unto him, and "he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." (Luke 3: 2, 3.) Oh how different was his call, first by prophecy, then by the filling of the Holy Ghost, then by much prayer, then by a distinct call of God, from the taking up of Christian work as a pleasant distraction or a congenial occupation! There are many who are tired of home life, or of domestic service, or of business, and who rush into Christian work

To Escape a Cross.

Persecution comes, their wills are crossed, or they are tried by want of success; and the same self-love which made them shun the cross at home or in the business, makes them fret against it in the work of God; they have not learned for themselves the lessons they would teach others, and thus they bring discredit on the cause of God. Such was not John the Baptist.

If this man of God had looked for earthly reward, he would not have been satisfied with the homely fare of the desert—locusts and wild honey—or the rough camel's hair raiment which he probably spun and wove for himself, regardless of the fashion of cities. Had he worked for the sake of salary, he must have had a well furnished house, and all the ordinary luxuries of a well-to-do religious leader. But John was a man absorbed by his message; he ate and drank in common with other men, but his eating and drinking were no object to him, except so far as they served to maintain and strengthen him, and so to further the great object of his existence—to prepare the way of the Lord. His clothing was of importance only so far as it served his mission. He was like a finger always pointed to say, Behold one who cometh after me! "There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose." There are some men whose lives and testimonies say, "Behold me, what a holy man I am, what an earnest Christian, what a soul winner!" But John's whole mission was, "Behold Him!"

God undertook the advertising of his preaching. Neither placards, bellman, brass bands, sandwiches, nor other means of modern advertising were needed. God put a hunger for a better life into the hearts of thousands, and then He so ordered that the repute of the desert preacher should reach the cities, and these hungry souls poured out into the desert, "Then went unto him all the land of Judea (they needed no pressure to attend his ministry) and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, Confessing Their Sins."

Why did they not confess their sins in the synagogues? A sinner has an instinct about religious teachers. He knows intuitively who will be likely to repel him, who will say to him, "Peace peace, when there is no peace," and who will be likely to bring him nearer to God. Often in an inquiry meeting, really anxious souls are not blest because there is so little of the Holy Ghost in those who seek to lead them that they cannot help shrinking into themselves from the instinct that their would-be helpers are not being led of God. When the power of the Holy Ghost comes full upon a meeting, the instinct to confess sin and be thoroughly rid of it is often present. John the Baptist followed the Spirit, and no true or lasting work can be done for God until we learn to follow the Holy Ghost. It is far better to be satisfied with fewer conversions, and they the work of the Holy Ghost, than to be eager for a great number, which may be partly the result of forced work, and only an imitation of the Spirit after all. John was full of the Holy Ghost: when he preached, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," the Holy Ghost led men to repent, and therefore the universal confession of sin among those who listened to him. When, afterwards, the burden of his preaching underwent a change, and the Messiah and His mission stood revealed to himself, and he preached, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." (John 1: 29), then the Holy Ghost was with the preaching, and awakened sinners found the burden of their sins was gone. The Holy Ghost knows how to choose the right subject for every congregation, and no one else ought to choose it. He will always own His own message when it is trusted to Him.

His Baptism.

John did not make much of his baptism; but he made use of it, as he did of every part of his ministry, to point to Jesus. "I indeed have baptized you with water, but He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." To John, this coming baptism of the Holy Ghost was more than all his ministry. He knew what it was to be a Holy-Ghost-filled man; he knew how little the world looks to a man who sees it in the light of the Holy Ghost; how small and insignificant self looks in the light of the Holy Ghost, and how Jesus alone stands the Central Figure in every picture which rises to the mind of one filled with the Spirit. Oh how it drives into a corner the comparatively unimportant controversy about infant and adult baptism, when the baptism of the Holy Ghost, which buries us out of sight in the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost (Matt. 28: 19), is become a practical reality in the life! Let the greater supersede the lesser, and the outward forms be clothed upon with

The Inward Reality

"And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth to Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan." He did not despise the outward sign; as He was circumcised to fulfil the righteousness of the law, so it became Him "to fulfil all righteousness" in being baptized with water (Matt. 3: 15), and so, by one Spirit being baptized into the one body with His people. "And straightway coming up out of the water. He saw the heavens opened, and the Spirit, like a dove, descending upon Him." Thus Jesus, at His baptism, was baptized, not with water only, but with the Holy Ghost, and thus prepared for His ministry. There is no true preparation for the work of God which comes short of being yielded up to the Holy Ghost, and letting him possess us. There may be one act of renouncing the will and accepting the Holy Ghost as master and guide, but it is an act to which we need to be true from hour to hour. The one yielding does not keep us yielded. We need, whenever there is a question of the will, to acknowledge the Holy Ghost's supremacy. A voice from heaven bore witness, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The pleasure of the Lord prospers in His hand. In Him only is God well pleased. He is pleased with us only as He sees us in Him.

Renewals can be sent any time previous to date of expiry, and the time will be added to that to which the subscriber is already entitled. Some time must always necessarily elapse after receipt of money before the date opposite to the name on label can be changed.

Notice of Expiration of subscription is always sent in addition to the date being given on the address label. When not renewed by date of expiration, the paper is stopped; no notice from the subscriber being required.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Vigorous Effort to Push the Tariff Bill through the Senate is being made. At a caucus of Republican Senators held on December 18 it was resolved to begin the day sittings at 11 o'clock in the morning and keep them up until 5:30 o'clock, and then to begin again at 8 o'clock for evening sittings. In addition to this it was determined not to take a holiday recess, but to keep the Senate in session day and night until the Tariff bill was passed. It was hoped that by this means factious opposition to the measure would be overcome, or that it would cease rather than undergo the strain of continuous work, and that then the bill might be sent to the House early in January. There is little prospect of its passing the present House, but it would be in completed shape for presentation to the new House either in extraordinary session or in ordinary course. A compromise was finally effected after consultation with Democratic Senators, by which it was agreed that if the proposal to have night sittings and no recess were abandoned the final vote should be taken on Jan. 21. The recess is to end on Jan. 2.

An Instructive Debate on Civil Service Reform took place in the House on December 18, when Mr. Amos Cummings, of New York, proposed to strike out from the appropriation bill the whole civil-service section. He admitted that he did so because all bills to repeal the law had been buried in committee, and he did not see any other way than to cripple the commission by striking out the whole appropriation. He believed the system one to favor certain voters at the expense of others, and that if members of the House were to be subjected to examinations, not five-eighths of them would ever reach the floor. General Spinola went further than Mr. Cummings, and expressed his belief that seven-eighths of the people were against civil-service reform. If the Democrats on his side could be honestly polled, they would be unanimously against it. Tammany Hall had declared against it time and time again. This was quite true, but the General must have been aware that the fact of Tammany Hall espousing any cause is sufficient to arouse opposition in many patriotic sections. The attempt to cripple the commission happily failed for this time; but the friends of the law, who have labored so long amid discouragements, to emancipate the civil service from partisan control, have evidently need to still continue their efforts to enlighten the people. The power of the people is the only thing that men of the Cummings and Spinola species dread.

A Formal Reiteration of the Monroe Doctrine, with special reference to the projects for a canal across the isthmus, is to be asked for by the Senate if a proposal made by Senator Edmunds on December 19 is adopted. The veteran statesman moved that the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European Government with the construction or control of any ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States, and as a menace to their welfare, and that the President of the United States be requested to communicate this expression of the views of Congress to the Governments of the countries of Europe. The recent collapse of the Panama undertaking renders this resolution a timely notice to all whom it may concern. It may, however, be hoped, in view of the treatment the Nicaraguan scheme is receiving in the House, that if the United States Government warns all other governments off, it will give the sanction asked for by the projectors of the Nicaraguan project.

A Joyful Demonstration Took Place at Jacksonville, Fla., on December 15, when the first party of refugees returned to the city. It was announced by the health authorites that on that day there would be an end of all restrictions upon entering the city, and the return of those who left in the early stages of the epidemic was expected. Besides arriving by train and boat, many reached the suburbs on the previous night by private conveyances and afoot to await the dawning of—to them—one of the brightest days in the history of the city. A large crowd had collected at the station to wait for them, when the laden trains arrived.

The Pressing Question of Immigration Restriction, which it was hoped that the Ford Committee would solve, appears likely to have no satisfactory or practicab'e remedy applied to it by that body. It is officially given out that the Committee will recommend a system of Federal inspection and registration to be carried out on both sides of the ocean. It is proposed that the immigrants shall be examined on oath, before they embark, from a set of written questions, and that if they answer these falsely they shall be liable to a prosecution for perjury after they arrive. The impossibility of examining singly each case does not appear to have occurred to the Committee, nor does the fact that the scheme would require an enormous and expensive body of officers to be maintained in Europe. Besides which, the anarchists, whom it is most desirable to exclude, are not as a rule men who would hesitate to commit perjury.

A Sensation in the French Senate was Produced on December 19, by a speech from Senator Challemel Lacour, who evidently voiced the opinions of a majority of the Senate, in representing the present condition of the country as one of danger. He interrupted a debate on a financial question by saying the present was not the moment to consider French finances, but the future of France. He condemned the policy now pursued in the schools, which, he said, struck at the root of the traditional principle of parental control. The main cause of existing evils, he declared, was radicalism, which relentlessly pursued the old founders of the Republic, and gave promises that were impossible of fulfilment. France had abandoned the most glorious of monarchies, and was about to fall at the feet of the least of men. This allusion to General Boulanger aroused intense excitement. The Senator proceeded to say that the Cabinet's duty was to check the movement toward the abyss, but instead of doing this the Cabinet were hastening the movement. It was time to return to a policy of common sense. He appealed to the Right to unite with the party of the Left, which was the upholder of order and liberty, to save the country.

The Mormon Problem Promises to Exercise the Canadian authorities. The Times says that "The Mormons who made a settlement some time ago in the region west of Manitoba assured the Dominion Government that they would not practice polygamy. It is suspected that the promise has not been kept. Among those who joined the original settlers was a member of the British Columbia Legislature, who resigned his seat in that body in order that he might cast his lot with them, and he asserts that they have not abandoned polygamy, and do not intend to give it up. He also volunteers a defence of so-called "plural marriage." The Dominion Government should begin to enforce its laws in this settlement now, when the number of persons to be dealt with is small. By such a course it may avoid a more vexatious and costly campaign against polygamy in years to come."

The Financial Collapse of the Panama Canal Company was announced last week. The first public intimation of it came in the form of the appointment of a committee in the French Legislature to consider a bill allowing the company to postpone payment of its maturing liabilities, including interest and redemption of bonds, for three months. The committee reported the bill adversely, and the Chamber, having discussed it, also rejected it. M. Floquet, the Premier, warned the Chamber that the rejection of the bill meant the bankruptcy of the company. Still more serious were the words of M. Goirand, who censured the managers of the canal, and said it would be impossible to leave the work of construction in their hands any longer, as they had been guilty of employing misrepresentations in order to attract capital. M. de Lesseps, who has been at the head of the undertaking, is eighty-three years of age. He entered on the project of cutting the Canal soon after his completion of the Suez Canal. Work was commenced upon it in 1881. The estimate of its cost was then fifty million dollars, but eighty million dollars' worth of bonds have already been issued. There is too much reason to fear that the investors, many of whom are poor, will lose the money they have put into the undertaking.

A Severe Engagement at Suakin was fought on December 20, and resulted in the victory of the combined English and Egyptian forces. The Mahdi's troops appear to have fought bravely. They were assailed at dawn by a tremendous fire from the English ships. When that ceased, General Grenfell led the Egyptian regiments in an attack on the trenches. He was supported by British cavalry, which did terrible execution. The victory was complete, and the victors encamped at night on the ground previously occupied by the enemy. It is thought, however, that the Mahdi, who has a large number of men at his disposal, will endeavor to retake the position. Lord Salisbury, the British Premier, has declared that he will not abandon Suakin, though he will not undertake another Soudan expedition. He contends that it would be madness to give up Suakin on the eve of suppressing the slave trade, because the final struggle with the slave dealers must be fought on the Red Sea.

An Affront to England is Said to be Contemplated by the Czar of Russia. At a meeting of Russian statesmen recently held at the Foreign Office in St. Petersburg, a high military authority urged that an ultimatum be sent to the Persian Government, warning it that Russia would take steps for the occupation of Persia unless it cancelled the treaty opening up the Karun country to the English. M. de Giers, the Foreign Minister, opposed such a course, and advised that the Government proceed with moderation. It is notorious, however, that the influence of M. de Giers over the Czar has long been waning, and it is therefore probable that in this matter his advice will not be taken.

The Hospital Association of New York Asks us to remind our readers that collections will be taken up in the churches of the city for the Hospital fund on December 30, the last Sunday of the year. Last year the churches and synagogues contributed $28,626.79, and the trades and other sources $21,822.36; making a total of $50,449.15. The needs of the hospitals have increased since then, and the Association earnestly hopes that the donations will be increased also.

A Very Noble Effort is Being Made by the Silver Cross Circle of the King's Daughters in New York to ameliorate the condition of the Lord's poor. They have found widows and others living without fire, in cold, wretched rooms, amid evil surroundings, unable to rent better places, and striving daily to earn a livelihood for themselves and their children; and also, not always successfully, to keep their little ones uncontaminated by the vice and immorality in the midst of which their poverty compels them to live. The King's Daughters are anxious to acquire a house which they could let out in sets of two or three rooms each, at moderate rents, to such persons, where by good sanitary arrangements, and the exclusion of undesirable persons, physical and moral welfare would be promoted. The effort is most commendable, and as it will be partially self-supporting not much money will be needed after the first expense. Contributions may be sent to Mrs. M. L. Hollister, 244 West 34th Street, New York.

The Following are the Topics Suggested by the Evangelical Alliance for the week of prayer: Sunday, January 6—"Arise, shine, for thy Light is come." (Isa. 60: 1.) Monday, January 7—Thanksgiving and confession for the individual, the family, the church, the community, and the nation. Tuesday—The Holy Spirit; His offices, gifts, fruits, and example. Wednesday—The family and the Church; for parents, children, master and servants; for ministers, officers, and members; for Christlikeness in heart and life; for increased activity, personal and associated; for Sunday-schools; for associations of young men and young women; for all forms of church work, for the oneness of all believers. Thursday.—Reforms: for the abolition of the manufacture, importation, sale, and use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage; for the destruction of the opium traffic; for the repeal of all laws which protect vice; for the sanctification of the Lord's Day; for social purity and all other needed reforms. (Prov. 23 29–32, Rom. 3: 8, Hab. 2: 15, &c.) Friday.—Missions—City, Home, and Foreign: Saturday—Nations: for peace and prosperity, both temporal and spiritual; for civil and religious liberty; for rulers, legislators and judges, and for all in authority; for just laws and their impartial enforcement; for nations suffering injustice at the hands of other nations; for the removal of international and class antipathies and jealousies; for purity in national life.

A Mother's Recovery of Her Long Lost Son took place in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. In 1863, a boy, six years old, was returning to his home from an unfinished building, where he had been playing, when he was roughly seized by a strange man, hurried on board a car and driven away. He was taken to a farm, where he was compelled to work, and was cruelly treated and half-starved. His condition at length attracted the notice of neighbors, who interfered, and finally had the man and his son arrested for cruelty. The boy drifted from one home to another, making himself useful wherever he went. He finally reached Chicago, where he settled down and prospered. A few weeks ago he met a stranger from Brooklyn, who scanned his features closely, and inquired about his history. The stranger told him that he strikingly resembled a family whom he knew in Brooklyn, from whom a child had been stolen twenty-five years ago, and advised him to make inquiries. He sent his photograph to a Brooklyn lawyer, who traced the family to Greenpoint, L. I. The family resemblance was recognized at once, and the long-lost son was written to. He at once set out for his mother's home, and arrived on December 18. The meeting was a strange one; the stalwart man of thirty-one being so unlike the little boy of six, whose memory the mother had cherished so long. She told him of all the efforts she had been making to find him, and of the sorrow she felt when at last she had been constrained to give him up for dead. He had been so occupied with his own sufferings and with the difficulties of making his way, that he had not thought of her during the years of separation. That is often the case with God's wandering children. Though He yearns over them, they take no thought of Him until His love is revealed to them. (Deut. 30: 4.)

A Wreath of Serpents on a Child's Head terrified a citizen of Orange, N. J., recently. He was walking in a small wood near his house with his little daughter, when he noticed a curiously twisted wreath among the dried leaves at the foot of a tree. He took it up and playfully placed it as a coronet on the child's brow. The girl did not like it, for it had a cold, clammy feeling as it touched her forehead, so she hastily shook it off. The father then picked it up and examined it more closely. To his horror he found that the wreath was not, as he had supposed, a few twisted twigs, but two snakes in a state of torpor. The cold snap had driven them together, and, twining each around the other, they had gone off in one of the long sleeps peculiar to those reptiles. He was filled with horror as he thought of the danger to which he had unwittingly exposed his child. There are many parents who by injudicious gifts and flatteries are doing a still more dangerous thing. In planting and nurturing seeds of vanity and pride in the hearts of their children, they are developing a disposition which may lead to eternal death. (Prov. 16: 18.)

A Man Was Saved from Death by his Boot-heel at Fall River, Mass., on December 17. A master plumber of that city was superintending some work in a new mill, and while one of his men went to the shop for some article that had been forgotten, the plumber strolled across a vacant lot to a ledge from which the stone for building was being taken out. He found no one around so he sauntered through the quarry looking at the rocks. Presently he noticed rather a deep fissure, and went close to it to examine it. He was intent upon it when he heard a shout and, looking around, saw a man crawling toward him on his hands and knees. The man called to him to come away instantly, and the plumber obeyed. Then an explanation followed. There were forty pounds of dynamite in the fissure, and the crawling man had been in a bomb-proof at a distance, vainly trying to fire it by electricity. Wondering why the charge did not go off, he crawled along to find out, and discovered the cause. The plumber's heel was pressed on the wire, grounding it, and unwittingly prevented the explosion. When he knew how slight a thing had saved him from a horrible death he almost fainted, but was not long in getting out of the dangerous place. If impenitent sinners realized how near they stand to a far worse doom, they would be similarly appalled, and lose no time in fleeing to the Refuge provided for them. (Ezek. 18: 31, 32.)

Pardon has Been Refused to an Escaped Convict by the Governor of New York. Sixteen years ago a young man was arrested in Middletown, N. Y., on a charge of burglary. The evidence was strong, and he was convicted, and sentenced to five years imprisonment. He was set at work in the cooper's shop in the Penitentiary. After a few months, he utilized the skill he acquired there, in making a barrel in which he concealed himself. The barrel was shipped away with others, and when the convict thought he had arrived at a safe place, he broke out the head of the barrel and escaped. Since that time he has wandered about the country, never staying long in one place. Very little is known of his manner of life, as to honesty, during the interval. Three years ago, however, he turned up in Union City, Penn., with a wife, and settled down to work. He set up in business as a baker and prospered. The old habits, however, were not eradicated. Last May he was again in the hands of the police. A lawyer of Union City had prosecuted him, and the ex-convict had revenged himself by trying to kill the lawyer and his family and by blowing his house up with dynamite. In prison he was recognized as the convict who had escaped from the New York Penitentiary, and when the Pennsylvania people have done with him, he is to be sent back to New York to finish his sentence. As it is now sixteen years since the crime was committed, the Governor was asked to pardon him. Last week Governor Hill sent a refusal, believing that a man in prison for another offence was not a fit object for executive clemency. The Governor is undoubtedly right; but sinners would be in a hopeless case if God dealt so with them. Through Christ, God offers pardon before reformation, and enables the repentant to reform too. (Ezek. 36: 27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. H. M. Scudder, D. D., is delivering a course of lectures on Christianity at Tokio, Japan, to crowds.

The project of establishing a Baptist University in New York City has been broached, and is meeting with warm support in the churches.

Twelve Jewish converts recently received Christian baptism at Rev. Jacob Freshman's Hebrew Christian Church, in St. Mark's Place, New York.

The Rt. Rev. H. Chauncey Riley, D. D., delivered his stereopticon lecture at the Y. M. C. A., Brooklyn, before a large and deeply interested audience.

Sir Edmund Hay Currie, the great London distiller, some time ago declared himself an abstainer. It is now stated that he has given up connection with the business.

A correspondent of a contemporary states that Prohibition in Iowa is being nullified by the importation of liquor in sealed bottles under the recent decision of the Supreme Court.

The Territorial Christian Endeavor Convention of Utah has just been held in Salt Lake City. The cause has taken deep root in that city, as well as in a number of other places throughout the Territory.

The Bombay Guardian says: "There is not a single Bible missionary in Beloochistan, Afghanistan, and the French possessions in Anam and Tonquin, nor in Siberia or any of the adjoining countries under Russian rule."

Rev. Frank W. Warne, who recently went to India as a Temperance advocate under the auspices of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union, has been speaking in Calcutta. At the close of one address, 140 persons signed the pledge.

The Rev. B. Fay Mills has been conducting revival services at Roxbury, Mass. The Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist Churches have united in the movement. The work has resulted in a wonderful stirring of the whole city.

A remarkable Christian movement among the Jews of Siberia is reported, the leader being a Polish Jew, Jacob Sheinmann by name. Exiled to Siberia twenty years ago because of avowal of belief in Christianity, he there began to proclaim his convictions.

The Rev. Dr. Meredith, who succeeded Dr. Pentecost, as pastor of the Tompkins Ave. Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been chosen chaplain of the Twenty-third Regiment. Dr. Meredith served in the war as captain of the 153d New York volunteers.

The Free-Will Baptist Church House in Concord, Ky. will be dedicated on December 30, and the friends there are expecting a large gathering. A small debt still remains on the House. Mr. W. H. Cox, of Concord, Ky., would be glad to receive contributions toward its removal.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding some remarkable meetings for boys and young men at Bloomington, Ill. On December 16 a congregation of 1,800 of them assembled, and hundreds went away unable to gain admission to the theatre in which the meetings are held. Much good is being done among them.

The Beulah Home, 1521 Oxford Street, Philadelphia, has been opened for Faith Work. The Home is specially designed for those who are sick in body or distressed in spirit, who desire rest and a closer walk with God. Consecration meetings are held every Tuesday at 3 P. M. Applications for admission and requests for prayer should be sent to Mrs. E. Stine, at the Home.

The Next Few Weeks will be the best time for canvassing for new subscribers. We are happy to learn that many of our friends are already introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among their friends and neighbors. Any one desiring sample copies for this purpose, will be supplied free of cost by writing for them, stating explicitly how many can be advantageously used. THE TRIAL OF YOUR FAITH.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The trial of your faith." 1 Pet. 1 : 7.

The Most Precious of all Possessions—The Germ of all Graces—Yet Involving Trial—I. Faith will be tried Surely—Like a Lantern to Light the Way Home—Trial the Element of Faith—Like a Salamander Living in Fire—Proves its Sincerity—Proves its Strength—II. Will be Tried Variously—By God's Nearness—By Blessings—More Frequently by Affliction—III. Will be Tried Individually—IV. Will be Tried for Useful Purposes—Developing and Strengthening—Encourages Others—Stars Seen in Darkness.

It is a great thing if any man can truthfully speak to you, my brother, about "your faith," for all men have not faith, and wherever faith is found, it is the token of divine favor. True faith is, in every case, of the operation of the Spirit of God. Its nature is purifying, elevating, heavenly. It is, of all things that can be cultivated in the human breast, one of the most precious. If thou hast faith, thou hast infinitely more than he who has all the world, and yet is destitute of faith. To him that believeth it is said, "All things are yours." Faith is the assurance of sonship, the pledge of inheritance, the grasp of boundless possession, the perception of the invisible. Within thy faith there lies glory, even as sleeps

The Oak Within the Acorn.

If thou hast faith, thou needest not ask for much more, save that thy faith may grow exceedingly, and that all the promises which are made to it may be known and grasped by thee. So far everything is delightful. But then comes in this word, which somewhat startles, and, if we are cowardly, may also frighten—"The trial of your faith." See you the thorn which grows with this rose! You cannot gather the fragrant flower without its rough companion. You cannot possess the faith without experiencing the trial; nor eat the lamb without the bitter herbs. These two things are put together—faith and trial; and it is of that trial of your faith that I am going to speak at this time, as God shall help me. It may be, may brother, that words said at this good hour shall comfort you while you undergo the sorer trial of your faith.

I. And, first, let me say of it, your Faith Will be Tried Surely.

You may rest assured of that. A man may have faith, and be for the present without trial; but no man ever had faith and was all his life without trial. That could not be—must not be; for faith, in the very nature of it, implies a degree of trial. I believe the promise of God. So far my faith is tried in believing the promise, in waiting for the fulfilment of the promise, in holding on to an assurance of that promise while it is delayed, and in continuing to expect the promise, and to act upon it until it is in all points fulfilled to me. To whom God has given faith, it is as though one gave a lantern to his friend because he expected it to be dark on his way home. The very gift of faith is a hint to you that you will want it; that at certain points and places you will especially require it, and that, at all points, and in every place, you will really need it. That God, who has made nothing in vain, especially makes nothing in the spiritual kingdom in vain; and if he makes faith, it is with the design that it should be used to the utmost and exercised to the full.

Expect trial, also, because trial is the very element of faith. Faith is a salamander that lives in the fire, a star which moves in a lofty sphere, a diamond which bores its way through the rock. Faith without trial is like a diamond uncut, the brilliance of which has never been seen. Untried faith is such little faith that some have thought it no faith at all. What a fish would be without water, or a bird without air, that would be faith without trial. If thou hast faith, thou mayest surely expect that thy faith will be tested: the great Keeper of the treasures admits no coin to His coffers without testing. It is so in the nature of faith, and so in the order of its living: it thrives not, save in such weather as might seem to threaten its death. Indeed, it is

The Honor of Faith to be Tried.

Shall any man say, "I have faith, but I have never had to believe under difficulties"? Who knows whether thou hast any faith? Shall a man say, "I have great faith in God, but I have never had to use it in anything more than the ordinary affairs of life, where I could probably have done without it as well as with it"? Is this to the honor and praise of thy faith? Dost thou think that such a faith as this will bring any great glory to God, or bring to thee any great reward? If so, thou art mightily mistaken. He that has tested God, and whom God has tested, is the man that shall have it said of him, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." If God, then, has given to any one of us a faith which is honorable and precious, it has full surely been submitted to its own due measure of trial; and if it is to be still more precious, it has yet more trials to endure.

We remember, also, two reasons for the trial of faith. The trial of your faith is sent

To Prove Its Sincerity.

If it will not stand trial, what is the good of it? That gold which dissolves in the furnace, and disappears amid the flame, is not the gold which shall be current with the merchant; and that faith of thine which is no sooner tried than straightway it evaporates, art thou not well rid of it? Of what use would it be to thee in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment? No; thou canst not be sure that thy faith is true faith till it is tried faith. Thou canst not be certain that it is worth having till it has been fitly tested, and brought to the touchstone of trial.

It must also be tested to prove its strength. We sometimes fancy that we have strong faith when, indeed, our faith is very weak; and how are we to know whether it be weak or strong till it be tried? A man that should lie in bed week after week, and perhaps get the idle whim into his head that he was very strong, would be pretty certain to be mistaken. It is only when he sets about work requiring muscular strength that he will discover how strong or how weak he is. God would not have us form a wrong estimate of ourselves. He loves not that we should say that we are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing, when we are the reverse; and therefore He sends to us the trial of our faith that we may understand how strong or how weak it is.

And besides that, dear friends, the trial of our faith is necessary

To Remove its Dross.

Is there any loss therein? I trow not. The gold loses nothing by the removal of its dross, and our faith loses nothing by the dissipation of its apparent force. Faith may apparently lose, but it actually gains. It may seem to be diminished, but it is not truly diminished. All is there that was worth having. "Why, a week ago," says one, "I used to sing, and think that I had the full assurance of faith; and now I can scarcely tell whether I am one of God's people or not." Now, you know how much faith you really possess. You can now tell how much was solid, and how much was sham; for had that which has failed you been real faith, it would not have been consumed by any trial through which it has passed. You have lost the froth from the top of the cup, but all that was really worth having is still there. Understand, then, dear friends, that for many necessary purposes there is a needs be for trial.

II. Now, secondly, your faith

Will be Tried Variously.

The trial of our faith does not come to all persons in the same way. There are some whose faith is tried each day in their communion with God. They pray this prayer: "Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me; and lead me in the way everlasting." That prayer is heard constantly; the visitations of the Lord are granted to them, and as the Lord comes, He tries them; for, believe me, there is no surer trial of our souls than the drawing near of God to our souls. Apart from any outward affliction, that searching thought, that inward feeling, which is somewhat more than thought; that holy, secret trembling, which comes upon our spirit when God draws near, is God's constant trial of our graces. If you walk away from God, and live without fellowship with Him, you may retain in your heart much falsehood, and fancy that you are full of spiritual gifts and graces; but if you draw near to God, and walk with Him, you will not be able to retain a false opinion of yourself. Remember our God is a consuming fire!

The presence of perfect holiness is killing to empty boastings and hollow pretences. You need not ask for any of those various forms of trial which God sends you may rest quite satisfied with His presence, as the most effectual purgation; for "His fan is in His hand, and He will throughly purge His floor." Whenever Jesus abides with us, "He shall sit as a refiner." Whoever He may leave alone in their defilement, "He will purify the sons of Levi." It is the Lord Himself that will be as a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap. Who may abide the day of His coming? Who that loves holiness would wish to escape it? Our prayer should be—

"Refining fire, go through my soul."

Ay, let the devouring flame go through me, and through me yet again, till this earthly grossness shall begin to disappear. Thus you see there is a constant trial of our faith, even in that which is its greatest joy and glory, namely, its power to make us see the Lord.

But the Lord uses other methods with His servants. I believe that He frequently tries us by the blessings which He sends us. This is a fact which is too much overlooked. When a man is permitted to grow rich, what a trial of faith is hidden away in that condition! It is one of the severest of providential tests! Where I have known one man to fail through poverty, I have known fifty men fail through riches. When our friends get on in the world, and have a long stretch of prosperity, they should invite their brethren to offer special prayer for them, that they may be preserved; for the thick clay is heavy stuff to walk upon, and when the feet slip into it, and it adheres to you, it makes travelling to heaven a very difficult thing. When we do not cling to wealth, it will not harm us; but there is a deal of bird-lime in money. You that have no riches may yet find your domestic comfort, that loving wife, those dear children—all these may tempt you to walk by sight instead of by faith. Ay, and continued health, the absence of all depression of spirit, and the long abiding of friends and relatives, may all make you self-contented, and keep you away from your God. It is a great trial of faith to have much for sight to rest upon. To be in the dark—altogether in the dark—is a grand thing for faith; for then you are sure that what you see is not seen of the flesh, but is in very deed a vision of spiritual faith. To be under a cloud is a trial, truly; but not one-half so much a trial as it is to have the light of this world.

One form of this trial is praise. You know how Solomon puts it: "As the fining-pot for silver, and the furnace for gold; so is a man to his praise." A Christian minister may go on preaching very earnestly, and God will help him, though everybody opposes him; but when the world comes and pats him on the back, and pride whispers, "You are a fine fellow; you are a great man!" then comes the test of the man. How few there are that can endure the warm atmosphere of congratulation! It is dangerously relaxing to the spirit. Yea, nobody can keep himself right under it, unless the almighty grace of God shall sustain his faith. When the soft winds blow they bring with them the temptation, "Now preach the doctrines that tickle men's ears!" "Go in to be scientific and learned and clever! Get the approbation of the great of the world, and the

in the church." And unless you say, "Get thee behind me, Satan; for thou savourest not the things that be of God," such a trial of faith may be too much for you. "Oh," says one, "that will not fall to my lot." No, no; you will not be a popular preacher, perhaps; but then, you may be very acceptable in the company wherein you move, and worldly people may flatter you to the verge of ruin. Because of your natural attainments, and the amiability of your temper, you may become a great favorite with ungodly people; and that is an intense trial to the faith of a child of God. The friendship of the world is as much enmity with God as it used to be in apostolic times. It is a bad sign when a courtier is in great favor with the king's enemies. Stand up, and stand out, as the servant of God, and in whatever sphere you move, make it your one and only business to serve my God, whether you offend or please. Happy shall you be if you survive the trial of your faith which this will involve!

Another trial of faith is exceedingly common and perilous nowadays, and that is, heretical doctrine and false teaching. There be some who are carried away with this wind of doctrine, and others carried away with the other; and blessed is he who is not offended in Christ; for, naturally, the cross of Christ is offensive to the minds of men. There are temptations that rise out of the gospel itself, yea, out of its very depth and breadth. There is a trial of faith in reading the Scriptures. You come across a doctrine which you cannot understand, and because you cannot understand it, you are tempted not to receive it. Or, when a truth which you have received appears to be hard, and speaks to you in an unlovely fashion, so that your natural feelings are aroused against it; this is a trial of your faith. Truth is not always welcome to our ignorance, or to our prejudice, and herein is a trial of faith.

But the trial of our faith comes

Usually in the Form of Affliction.

Our jealous Lover uses tests that it may be seen whether He has our heart. The trial of your faith comes thus: You say, "Lord Jesus, I love thee. Thou art my best beloved." "Well," says the heavenly Lover, "if it be so, then the child that nestles in thy bosom will sicken and die. What wilt thou say then?" If thou be indeed true in what thou hast stated concerning thy supreme love to Jesus, thou wilt give up thy darling at His call, and say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." The Lord is very jealous of our love. I do not mean that He is so towards all of you: I speak of His own people. The more He loves us, the more He tests us. Can we stand that test? Can we let all go for His sake? Do you answer that you can? Time will show.

III. In the third place, your faith

Will Be Tried Individually.

The text says, the trial of your faith. O dear friend, it is an interesting subject, is it not, the trial of faith? It is not quite so pleasant to study alone the trial of your faith. It is stern work when it comes to be your trial, and the trial of your faith. You have not gone much into that particular department, perhaps. Well, I say again, do not wish to do so. Do not ask for trials. Children must not ask to be whipped, nor saints pray to be tested. The Lord Jesus Christ has been glorified by the trial of His people's faith. He has to be glorified by the trial of your faith. You are very obscure, perhaps, dear brother. You have but few talents, my dear sister. But, nevertheless, there is a particular shape and form of trial that will have to be exercised upon you rather than upon anyone else. "Oh," say you, "I know it, sir; I know it." Well, then, if you know it, do not complain of it; because, when you have your own trial, and the trial of your own faith, you are only treated like the rest of the family. What son is there whom the father chasteneth not? You are only treated like the Head of the family. You are only treated in the way which the great Father of the family knows is necessary for us all. God had one Son without sin, but He never had a son without trial, and He never will have until He has taken us all home out of this world. Why should we expect that God should deal better with us than others?

IV. Let me yet further observe, that your faith

Will Be Tried For a Useful Purpose.

The trial of your faith will increase, develop, deepen, and strengthen it. "Oh," you have said, "I wish I had more faith." Your prayer will be heard through your having more trial. Often in our prayers we have sought for a stronger faith to look within the veil. The way to stronger faith usually lies along the rough pathway of sorrow. Only as faith is contested will faith be confirmed. Affliction is the best bit of furniture in my house. It is the best book in a minister's library. We may wisely rejoice in tribulation, because it worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and by that way we are exceedingly enriched, and our faith grows strong.

The trial of our faith is useful, not only because it strengthens it, but because it leads to a discovery of our faith to ourselves. I remember Mr. William Jay saying that birds' nests are hard to find in summer time, but anyone could find a bird's nest in winter. When all the leaves are off the trees the nests are visible to all. Often in the days of our prosperity, we fail to find our faith; but when our adversity comes, the winter of our trial bares the boughs, and we see our faith at once. We are sure that we believe now, for we feel the effect of faith

Upon Our Character.

This trial of our faith does good to our fellow-Christians. They see how we are supported, and they learn to bear their troubles bravely. I do not know anything that is better for making us brave than to see others believe in Christ and bear up manfully. To see that blind saint so happy makes us ashamed to be sad. To see content in an inmate of the workhouse compels us to be thankful. Sufferers are our tutors; they educate us for the skies. When men of God can suffer—when they can bear poverty, bereavement or sickness, and still rejoice in God, we learn the way to live the higher and more Christly life. When Patrick Hamilton had been burned in Scotland, one said to his persecutors, "If you are going to burn any more, you had better do it in a cellar, for the smoke of Hamilton's burning has opened the eyes of hundreds." It was so. Suffering saints are living seed.

Come, let us be comforted as to the trial of our faith. There is no hurt in it. It is all for good. The trial of our faith is entirely in the hands of God. Nobody can try us without God's permission. He will try us just as much as we ought to be tried, and no more. While He tries us with one hand, He will sustain us with the other. If He gives us bitters, He will give us sweets in full proportion. A dear sister said to me this week, "When I used to be in poverty and in trouble, the Word of God was much more sweet to me than it is now that I am prospered." I do not wonder at it. I have made a similar remark when I have been long without an illness. Some of us have cried, "Take me back to my sickness again. Take me back to slander and rebuke again."

A Scotch Saint

said when they met in the moss, or by the hillside, and were harried by Claverhouse and his dragoons, Christ was present at the sacraments in the heather much more than He ever was afterwards when they got into the kirk, and sat down quietly. Our worst days are often our best days, and in the dark we see stars that we never saw in the light. So we will not care a pin what it is that may befall us here, so long as God is with us, and our faith in Him is genuine. Christian people, I am not going to condole with you, but I congratulate you upon your troubles, for the cross of Christ is precious.

But you that do not love my Lord and Master, if you roll in riches, your joys are but the prelude to your woes. Oh, that God would have mercy upon you, and that you would have mercy upon yourselves, and flee at once to Jesus, and put your trust in Him! Faith in the work, offices, and person of the Lord Jesus is the way of salvation. May He help you to run in it at this hour, for His name's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TWO LITTLE SOUTHERNERS IN THE WAR.

WHEN there first began to be talk at Oakland about the war, the boys thought it would be a dreadful thing; their principal ideas about war being formed from an intimate acquaintance with the Bible, and its account of the wars of the children of Israel, in which men, women, and children were put to the sword. This gave a vivid conception of its horrors. The boys were Frank and Willy; Frank being the eldest. They went by several names on the place. The mother called them her "little men" with much pride; Uncle Balla spoke of them as "them chillern," which generally implied something of reproach; and Lucy Ann, who had been taken into the house to run after them when they were little boys, always coupled their names as "Frank 'n' Willy." Peter and Cole did the same when their mistress was not by.

Freedom Refused by a Slave.

One evening in May, about sunset, as the boys were playing in the yard a man came riding through the place on the way to Richmond. His horse showed that he had been riding hard. He said the Yankees were coming. It was a raid. He had ridden ahead of them, and had left them about Greenbay Depot, which they had set on fire. It was the first time the boys ever saw their mother exhibit so much emotion as she then did. She came to the door and called, "Balla, come here!" Balla came to the portico and looked up with an air of inquiry. "Balla, I want you to know that if you wish to go you can do so. I want you all to know it." She was speaking now so as to be heard by the cook and the maids, who were standing about the yard listening to her. "I want you all to know it—every one on the place."

"Hi, mistis," broke in Uncle Balla, "whar is I got to go? I wuz born on dis place an' I spec' to die here, an' be buried right yonder"; and he turned and pointed up to the dark clumps of trees that marked the graveyard on the hill a half-mile away, where the colored people were buried. "Dat I does," he affirmed positively. "Y' all sticks by us, and we'll stick by you."

"I know I ain' gwine nowhar wid no Yankees or nothin'," said Lucy Ann, in an undertone.

The boys' mother started to say something further to Balla, but though she opened her lips, she did not speak; she turned suddenly and went into the house and into her chamber, where she shut the door behind her. The boys thought she was angry, but when they softly followed her a few minutes afterward, she got up hastily from where she had been kneeling beside the bed, and they saw that she had been crying.

A Brave Little Hero.

[Fugitives from the Southern army were concealed in a cave on the plantation. The boys were sent to their hiding-place with food. They delivered it, but on their way home were captured by a party of Northern troops, who were searching for the fugitives.] "Look here," said the Northern corporal; "we've got you, and we're going to make you tell us where those rebels are hiding; so you might just as well do it easy. If you don't, we're going to make you."

The boy said nothing, but faced his captor, who held a strap in his hand.

"Are you going to tell us?" he asked.

"No."

"Don't you know?" He came a step nearer and held the strap forward. There was a long silence. The boy's face paled perceptibly.

"If you say you don't know—" said the man, hesitating in face of the boy's resolution.

"Yes, I know; but I ain't going to tell you," said Frank, bursting into tears.

"If you don't tell, we're going to shoot you," said one of the soldiers, drawing his pistol.

The boy shut his mouth close and looked straight at the corporal. The man laid down his pistol, and seizing the boy's hands, tied them behind his back. "Get ready, men!" he said, as he drew the boy aside to a small tree, putting him with his back to it.

Frank thought his hour had come. He thought of his mother and Willy, and wondered if the soldiers would shoot Willy, too. His face twitched and grew ghastly white. Then he thought of his father, and of how proud he would be of his son's bravery when he should hear of it. He wondered where the bullets would hit him, and whether, when he was dead, his mother would come and kiss him.

"I want to say my prayers," he said, faintly. The soldier made some reply which he could not hear, and started forward; but just then all grew dark before the boy's eyes. Next he thought he must have been shot, for he felt very wet about the face and was lying down. He opened his eyes. He was lying with his head in the lap of the big soldier, and the corporal was leaning over him, throwing water in his face from a cap.

"Am I shot?" asked Frank.

"No! Do you think we'd have touched a hair of your head—and you such a brave little fellow? We were just trying to scare you a bit, and carried it too far, and you got a little faint—that's all."

The boy did not know that the big dragoon was looking down at the light hair resting on his arm, and that he was home in fancy in Delaware; or that the pressure the boy felt from his strong arms was a caress given for the sake of another boy far away on the Brandywine.

"I've got a curly-headed fellow at home, just the size of you," the soldier said, softly.

Frank saw that his eyes were moist. "I hope you'll get safe back to him," he said.

"God grant it!" said the soldier.

REV. WILLIAM H. SCOTT, D. D.,

Father-in-law of the President-Elect.

ONE of the most interesting men in the Civil Service is an aged clerk in the Pension Office, who, though eighty-eight years old, is remarkable for his regularity and punctuality. He is tall, and still erect of bearing. His work is said to be a model of neatness and accuracy, and his manner singularly courteous and affable. The venerable clerk is the Rev. William H. Scott, D. D., a relative of General Winfield Scott, and the father of the wife of President-elect Harrison.

Dr. Scott's life has been one of active usefulness. For many years he was a professor in Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, and has occupied other eminently responsible positions. His home in Washington, D. C., is with his eldest daughter, Mrs. Scott-Lord, and there the old gentleman has the pleasure of the society also of two married granddaughters and their children.

IMPRISONED MUSIC.

By Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon.

A CURIOUS little incident happened lately during a time of prolonged sickness. At the close of a very dark and gloomy day I lay resting on my couch as the deeper night drew on, and though all was bright within my cosy little room, some of the external darkness seemed to have entered into my soul and obscured the spiritual vision. Vainly I tried to see the hand which I knew held mine, and guided my fog-enveloped feet along a steep and slippery path of suffering. In sorrow of heart I asked, "Why does my Lord thus deal with His child? Why does He permit lingering weakness to hinder the sweet service I long to render to his poor servants?"

For a while silence reigned in the little room, broken only by the crackling of the oak-log burning on the hearth. Suddenly I heard a sweet, soft sound, a little, clear, musical note like the tender trill of a robin beneath my window. "What can that be?" I said to my companion, who was dozing in the firelight; "surely no bird can be singing out there at this time of the year and night!" We listened, and again heard the faint, plaintive notes, so sweet, so melodious, yet mysterious enough to provoke for a moment our undisguised wonder. Presently my friend exclaimed, "It comes from the log on the fire!" and we soon ascertained that her surprised assertion was correct. The fire was letting loose the imprisoned music from the old oak's inmost heart! Perchance he had garnered up this song in the days when all went well with him, when birds twittered merrily on his branches, and the soft sunlight flecked his tender leaves with gold. But he had grown old since then, and hardened; ring after ring of knotty growth had sealed up the long-forgotten melody, until the fierce tongues of the flames came to consume his callousness, and the vehement heat of the fire wrung from him at once a song and a sacrifice.

Ah! thought I, when the fire of affliction draws songs of praise from us, then indeed are we purified and our God is glorified! Perhaps some of us are like this old oak log, cold, hard, and insensible; we should give forth no melodious sounds were it not for the fire, which kindles round us, and releases tender notes of trust in Him and cheerful compliance with His will! "As I mused, the fire burned," and my soul found sweet comfort in the parable so strangely set forth before me! Singing in the fire! Yes! God helping us, if that is the only way to get harmony out of these hard, apathetic hearts, let the furnace be heated seven times hotter than before.

A STREET DISCUSSION IN BRESLAU.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most active and successful of the missionaries to the Jews is a converted Israelite named Hartmann, who recently paid a visit to Breslau, and spent a night at an inn discussing with Jews in relation to Jesus Christ as the Messiah and the world's Saviour. He says: "In the evening a number of Jews assembled before the door of our house, with whom Mr. Händler and Mr. Lotka and I had a long discussion. A Jewish soldier joined them, and took a lively part in the discussion. He promised to call upon us in the evening, and he kept his word. He had a number of objections to make against the New Testament, rejected the Talmud, and expressed, like many Reform Jews, as they are called, the barest infidelity, but also the greatest ignorance of the spirit of the Mosaic law. When I asked him whether he had fulfilled the Word of God, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart,' &c., and whether he was what the Lord requires Israel to be, namely, holy, as the Lord their God is holy, he could not answer in the affirmative. I then showed him the necessity of man's redemption and reconciliation with God. He did not answer to that. When he left, he accepted several books and tracts.

"In the evening Brother Lotka returned from a walk in the streets, accompanied by a number of young men, Israelites, who seemed to find much pleasure in disputations. The subject of the discussion was the sacrifices of the Old Testament; but one of them began soon to speak of the deity of Jesus. I left in the first instance the argument to Brother Lotka, but afterwards took part. I pointed him first to the serpent of brass in the wilderness, as a proof that we are in need of a mediator — the Jews having just maintained that we can and must draw near to the Father without a mediator — and then I resumed the subject of the sacrifices, proving to them that no Jew could have forgiveness of his sins without a sacrifice.

"To this the Jews answered that they do now bring the blood of their heart by fasting, which blood is much better than the blood of beasts—the sacrifices of old. To this it was replied that also the Jews of old were bound to fast, and that the sacrifices were of no use and value to them, if they did not feel, and have, at the same time, true repentance of their sins. Both true repentance and sacrifice were indispensably necessary for every one who wished forgiveness of his sins. The lifting-up of the serpent and sacrifices were the means by which the Jews in the desert were healed, and could find forgiveness of their sins. But they were only types of the Messiah. The Jews listened for a longer time to these truths than I had expected. It was also proved to them, from the prophets Haggai and Daniel, that the Messiah must already have come, and that no other one than Jesus of Nazareth can be that Messiah.

"In the evening some Jews came again. One of them was an ignorant man, but seemed to be of an earnest mind. Afterwards five or six others came, to whom the Gospel truth was preached. The purpose of the coming of Messiah into the world, His doings and sufferings, the fulfilment of the sacrifices in Him, the necessity of redemption, no reconciliation with God without blood—these were the subjects of which we spoke to them. One of them began to blaspheme, and left us blaspheming; others listened attentively, and appeared to be impressed."

A Restored Palace of Ancient Nineveh.

A PALACE OF NINEVEH.

(See Illustration.)

THE excavations which have been made by Mr. Layard and Mr. George Smith on the site of the ancient city of Nineveh, have rendered it possible to form a complete idea of what must have been the beauty and style of its royal palaces. They appear to have been built on artificial mounds varying in height from thirty to fifty feet above the surrounding plain. These were in some cases constructed of regular rows of bricks, and in others merely of earth and timber. The former prevail at Nimroud, and the latter at the group now known as Kouyunjik. A solid wall of masonry protected the face of the mound, and majestic flights of broad steps led up to the palace itself. Some of the mounds were of enormous extent, looking in the distance like natural elevations rather than the work of human hands. The palaces erected on these mounds or platforms were of several stories, and were built of huge beams and sun-dried bricks faced with slabs of alabaster.

When Assyria was overrun by the Medes about 656 B. C., Nineveh, its capital, was utterly destroyed, and its people carried captive. Happily when the chief buildings were overthrown the beams and material of the upper stories protected the contents of the lower stories, and these were further preserved from decay, through exposure to wind and rain, by the accumulation of rubbish under which they were buried. In some cases this layer was twenty feet thick.

In 1845 Layard succeeded in penetrating to the ruins under the rubbish, and still later Mr. George Smith continued the search. The reward repaid all the toil and danger. A large number of tablets—nearly ten thousand—were found covered with inscriptions. The writing had been done on terra-cotta clay while it was soft, and the tablets, which were about a foot square, were then subjected to heat until they were hard. They were then set up against the walls of the rooms in the king's palace, and formed the library. One collection was commenced by King Shalmanezer about 860 B. C., and was largely increased by Sardanapalus, his successor. After immense labor the writing has been deciphered, and it is found that the tablets contain a continued history of the reigns of the kings. They also bear records of current traditions. Very remarkably, there are two records substantially confirming the Mosaic account of the Creation and the Deluge. The illustration here given gives a correct idea of the appearance of a royal palace in the days of Assyrian glory, the ground-plan having been found clearly marked out, and the superstructure indicated by the ruins discovered on the spot.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Strange Tongues.

ONE speaker was Brother Edwards, a tried champion of the Faith, and to him every one listened with profound attention, eagerly drinking in his every utterance. I can almost, even now, imagine that he was really inspired. Then I firmly believed he was. His voice thrilled with an earnestness which seemed to us something more than the mere excitement of the soul. A burning fire seemed to flash from his large, expressive eyes; his features were lighted up with that animation which gives a saint-like halo to the earnest face when fired with indignation or pleading soul-felt truths; while his whole frame seemed to glow with the glory of a land beyond this earth, as, in the most impressive and convincing language, he reminded us that our sins had been washed away by the waters of baptism, that upon us had been poured the gifts and graces of the Spirit, and that it was our sacred privilege to testify of these things.

The effect of this exhortation was magical. We forgot all our outward surroundings, in the realization that the great work of the Lord was so gloriously begun, and that it would surely go on conquering and to conquer. One sister—an elderly woman—who was present, unable to control her emotion, burst out with that Mormon hymn which I have heard some old Nauvoo Saints declare produced upon the people in those days an enthusiasm similar to that which moves the heart of Frenchmen when they hear the soul-stirring notes of the Marseillaise:

"The Spirit of God like a fire is burning!
The latter-day glory begins to come forth;
The visions and blessings of old are returning,
The angels are coming to visit the earth.
We'll sing and we'll shout with the armies of heaven,
Hosannah! Hosannah to God and the Lamb,
All glory to them in the highest be given,
Henceforth and for ever: Amen, and Amen."

I have heard, in magnificent cathedrals, hoary with the dust of time, and in vast places of amusement dedicated specially to music and to song, the outpouring of that glorious vocal flood which a chorus of well-trained singers can alone send forth. I have felt sometimes that entrancing state of ecstasy which thrilled the soul of the seer in Patmos as he listened to the melody of the angelic throng—"the voice of many waters, and the peal of mighty thunders, and the notes of harpers harping upon their harps"; but never, even when surrounded by all that was best calculated to produce a sentiment of devotion in my mind—never did I experience so rapt a feeling of communion with "the armies of heaven" as I felt in that unadorned meeting room, surrounded by those plain but earnest and united people.

Nor was I alone in this. The feeling was contagious. There was not one present who did not sympathize. And thus, I suppose, melody has always played a prominent part in all religious revivals, whether of Divine or human origin. The Apostles had their psalms and hymns and spiritual songs; the Martyrs their Te Deum; the Waldenses made the hills and vales of Piedmont vocal with their singing; the Lollards and Hussites had their melodies; and in more modern days the followers of Luther, Wesley, and (may I add?) Joseph Smith have poured out the fullness of their souls after the same fashion.

The last notes of the hymn had scarcely died away when another, and then another brother arose and bore testimony to the great work, told what the Lord had done for them personally, told of their zeal for the faith, and exhorted all present to persevere unto the end. Again prayer was offered, another hymn sung, and the saints were dismissed with a solemn benediction. I was now a Mormon in every sense of the word, although entirely ignorant of Utah politics and polygamy. My dreams were of a life of happiness spent in seeking to convert the whole world to the religion of Jesus, which I believed had been restored again to earth by the ministry of holy angels. It is easy to say that such an ambition was ill-directed when associated with Mormonism, but no one can deny that, in itself, it was the noblest and purest that could inspire the heart of man. There was no sacrifice too great for me to make, there was no object too dear for me to resign, if it stood in the way of my sacred calling. The whole current of my thoughts and plans was now changed. It was henceforth my duty to be entirely forgetful of self, and to devote my energies, my all, to the advancement of the Kingdom of God. My life was to be identified with the Saints—my faith required it, and I was willing that it should be so.

But what of my beloved France, and what of my betrothed husband? This reflection aroused within me a most painful train of thought. How many fond and endearing memories entwined themselves around my heart at that moment, when most I needed to banish them for ever! With what lingering love did I look back to those dear ones from whom I had parted but a few short weeks before, and whom I might perhaps never see again! To return would be to desert my newly adopted friends and faith—to violate the covenant which I had made at baptism, to "be ever afterwards governed by the servants of God."

No, it was too late; I could not now return; I tried to persuade myself that I did not even wish to—in a word, affection and what I thought duty were at war together in my heart. All my former ties and associations must now be severed, however terrible the cost might be; and I was bound not only to submit, but even to glory in the sacrifice. Thus I argued away the regrets which would at times agitate my very soul, and cause me much painful thought.

The trial of my profession in the new faith came swiftly to my door. My marriage engagement must be broken off, though I knew not how that could honorably and conscientiously be done. Of myself, I had no wish to draw back from anything that I had promised of my own free will; and much less did I desire to be faithless to my solemnly plighted word. I now first realized the all-absorbing influence of an earnest religious faith. I was brought face to face with the fact that I could not marry out of the Mormon Church. The teaching of the Elders was against it, and I saw that in this they were consistent. Great as was the trial, and painful as was the sacrifice, I resolved to be true to my religion. How very earnestly the Elders insisted upon such sacrifices, may be seen from an appeal made at a later date by the "Apostle" Orson Pratt. Brother Orson was in Europe, and, speaking authoritatively, he set forth the duties of mothers and daughters in "Babylon," as he graciously styled the rest of the world, in the following terms, which unmistakably show the purposes of the leaders relative to marriage:

"Many of you have daughters, some of whom are grown to womanhood; others are now young. Would you have them gather with you to a land where virtue and peace dwell, where God has promised to protect and bless the righteous? If so, teach them, as they love their parents, and the Saints, and the truth, not to throw themselves away by marrying Gentiles; teach them to keep themselves entirely aloof from Gentile courtships and associations. Scores of women who once were counselled as you are now, are mourning in wretchedness, in bondage to Gentile husbands, cut off from all privilege of gathering with their fathers, mothers, brethren, and sisters; and, in some instances, cut off from even attending the Saints' meetings. But this is not all. They are raising up children in these lands to perish with themselves in the general desolations coming upon Babylon. But, what is still more aggravating and heartrending, they are raising up children not only destined for temporal judgments, but who must for ever be cut off from the presence of God and the glory of the celestial kingdom. What fearful responsibility for any young sister to voluntarily take upon herself, after all the warnings she has received. See to it, then, parents, that you not only do not give your consent, but forbid all such marriages.

"Let them marry according to the holy order of God, and begin to lay the foundation of a little family kingdom which shall no more be scattered upon the face of the earth, but dwell in one country, keeping their genealogies from generation to generation, until each man's house shall be multiplied as the stars of heaven." These were the influences which were brought to bear upon my mind at a time when it was peculiarly sensitive, and open to impressions from without.

While in this uncertain state a little incident occurred, which, though in itself of the most trifling nature, assisted in forming my ultimate decision. It was a beautiful evening in early summer, and my mother and sister asked me to accompany them to one of the testimony meetings which I have already described. This meeting was very similar to the others, with one notable exception—it was here that I saw and heard, for the first time in my own experience, the "gift of tongues" exercised.

Long before I had even heard of Mormonism, I had frequentiy thought how wonderfully useful this gift must have been to the Apostles. One of the great difficulties encountered by the missionary is learning the language of the people among whom he works and lives. To be able to dispense with all this labor, and to be understood wherever he went, must have lightened the mind of half its load; and, naturally, when I heard that the Mormons had "the gift of tongues," I supposed it was the self-same power of diverse speech as that exercised by the Apostles; and I presume the reader will conjecture with me that it was the same "gift," or, at least, some imitation of it. How surprised I was when I first discovered the meaning of the term, "speaking in tongues" among the Mormons, may perhaps be imagined when I explain what happened at that testimony meeting.

After prayer and singing, and listening to several very fervent addresses from some of the elders, Brother Seely had delivered a most impassioned speech, and had hardly concluded when Sister Ellis, who was sitting near me, gave evidence of being in an abnormal condition of mind, which to me was painful in the extreme. Her hands were clenched, and her eyes had that wild and supernatural glare which is never seen save in cases of lunacy or intense feverish excitement. Every one waited breathlessly, listening to catch what she might say—you might have heard a pin drop. Then in oracular tones, and with all the impassioned dignity of one inspired from heaven, she began to speak. I say "speak," as that term is generally applied to the utterances of the human voice; but she did not speak in the sense in which we always employ that word; she simply emitted a series of sounds. They seemed to me chiefly the repetition of the same syllables—something like a child repeating, la, la, la, le, lo; ma, ma, ma, mi, ma; dele, dele, dele, hela—followed, perhaps, by a number of sounds strung together, which could not be rendered in any shape by the pen.

Sometimes in the Far West, in later years, I have heard old Indian women, crooning weirdly monotonous and outlandish ditties in their native tongue. These wild dirges, more nearly than anything else I ever heard, resembled the prophetic utterances of Sister Ellis; save only that the appearance of the latter was far too solemn to admit of even a smile at what she said. Ridiculous as this appears when I now write it down on paper, and strange as it even then was to me, there was something so commanding, so earnest, so "inspirational," if I may be allowed the term, in Sister Ellis's manner, that I could not wonder at the attention which the brethren and sisters paid to this gifted speaker in tongues.

I now know that these extraordinary displays are by no means confined to Mormonism. People of a certain temperament, excited to frenzy, have in all ages given painful illustrations of this mental aberration, as the student who remembers the Convulsionnaires of the Middle Ages, the Munster Anabaptists of Luther's time, and the various emotional sects of more modern days, notably those of Edward Irving's church, will bear me witness. But at that time, new in the faith, and believing as I did that, as the Elders said, it was the manifestation of the power of God as foretold by the propet Joel, though secretly I felt a sense of repugnance, I tried to combat my sentiments.

Overcome by the excitement of the moment, Sister Ellis suddenly paused, not so much intentionally as from sheer inability to proceed; and the leading Elders looked round from one to another to see if any one was present who could interpret. The gift of interpretation is very rarely possessed by the same person who has the gift of tongues, and you may often hear one after another arise and "speak," but there is no one to "interpret," and the Saints go away unedified. Even when an interpreter is present, there is no authority to determine whether he gives the proper rendering of the sounds uttered, and I have over and over again heard the most ludicrous stories of the comical interpretation placed by some half-witty or half-witted expounder upon these oracles.

When Brother Brigham—then a man who was lowly in his own eyes—first met the prophet Joseph Smith, at Kirtland, Ohio, there was a scene somewhat like the one I have described; and the future leader of "this people," as he called the Saints, himself spake with tongues and uttered wonderful things. But even supposing his words at the time to have been of the wisest, we all know from the example of Balaam's reprover, that it does not require a very high order of intellect to speak in unaccustomed language—and that, too, to some most important purpose.

In later days the exercise of this gift was discouraged by the Elders, and especially by Brigham Young. Going one day, some years after, to the Lion House to see a certain member of the Prophet's little family concerning a subject which lay very near to my heart at that time, we prayed together earnestly and anxiously; when suddenly the lady's face was lighted up with a supernatural glow, and placing her hand on my head she, sibyl-like, poured forth a flood of eloquence, which—although I did not understand a single word that was uttered—I confess sent through me a magnetic thrill as if I had been listening to an inspired seeress. Another of Brigham's wives who was present, interpreted the words of blessing to me, but added: "Do not speak of this, Sister Stenhouse, for Brother Young does not like to hear of these things." Thus we see that one inspired prophet in the presence of another "prophet, seer, and revelator," could himself take part at one time in a miraculous manifestation, which in later years he "would not like to hear of," if it was only one of his wives who enacted the prophet's rôle.

But my meeting! I have wandered far away from that. After more testimony, more "speaking," and much enthusiasm, the Saints separated. My sister was talking with a young lady friend, and regretting that no one present had been able to interpret; and I stood by, but did not join in the conversation. Suddenly the young lady turned to me and said: "Sister Fanny, do you not see in all this, more and more, the convincing power of God?"

Rather hesitatingly I replied, "Yes, I think, I do." "Think! sister?" said she, with warmth. "Oh, yes, I see by your looks that you are only half convinced; your faith is not strong enough yet; but remember, whatsoever is of doubt is sin!" "But," I answered, "I do not see clearly what good we receive from these manifestations when no one can understand them." "That is your want of faith—nothing else," she said; "you have the evidence of the truth before you, and you see how these miraculous powers build up the belief of God's people; and yet you doubt. To doubt is sin: whatsoever is not of faith is sin. You must pray, and strive to be strengthened against temptation."

All this was not very logical, and it certainly did not help to dispel my doubts. But twice, in the course of a few short sentences, she had used a certain expression, which, though trifling in itself was recalled to my mind very forcibly before many days had passed. This was my first experience of speaking in tongues.

"I LEAVE IT ALL WITH THEE."

O God, I leave it all with Thee:
Thou leadest me;
And though the way at times seem drear,
I will not fear.

Do not I know that I am Thine,
And Thou art mine?
Why then should I be filled with care,
Or why despair?

There is an eye, a loving eye,
That from the sky
Is watching o'er me when I dread
My path to tread.

There is a voice, a gentle voice,
Bids me rejoice,
E'en in the very gloomiest hour
When storm-clouds lower.

There is a hand omnipotent,
And I'm content
While I can trust that hand divine
Is holding mine.

There is a heart of tenderness,
And its caress
Is balm to my poor troubled breast
And gives me rest.

That eye, that voice, that hand, that heart,
Sweet peace impart;
And in them all by faith I see
One who loves me:

One whom I ever trust and love
On whom, to all eternity
I will rely.

Then, Lord, I leave it all with Thee;
Thou strengthenest me;
And if the way seem dark and drear,
I will not fear.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

An earnest, solemn work, full of helpful hints on the aids and hindrances to prevailing prayer.

FIFTEENTH THOUSAND (NEW).

TO THE WORK! TO THE WORK! A Trumpet Call. Exhortations to Christians.
This new work, by Mr. Moody, is in the line of his most successful effort, that of stirring Christians to active, personal, aggressive work.

SIXTIETH THOUSAND.

SECRET POWER; or, the Secret of Success in Christian Life and Work.
"A deeply earnest and helpful book for the use of Christians on the work of the Holy Spirit in the believer, inciting to more diligent effort and to a more perfect use of the privileges of the 'Sons of God.'"

SIXTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

THE WAY TO GOD, AND HOW TO FIND IT.
"It puts the way so plainly that 'he who runs may read.'"—Religious Telescope.
"Full of pathos, point and power. Cannot fail to be the means of quickening and blessing wherever read."—Methodist.

NINETY-SECOND THOUSAND.

HEAVEN; its Hope; its Inhabitants; its Happiness; its Riches; its Reward.
"While adapted to the humblest capacity, it will command the attention of the mature and thoughtful."—National Presbyterian.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH THOUSAND.

TWELVE SELECT SERMONS.
"With the effect of these addresses, when spoken, the whole land is acquainted, and now that they are printed, they will tend to keep in force the impression they have already made."—Methodist.

The above works, the combined sale of which has already reached over Three Hundred and Fifty Thousand are now issued in a new dress, known as the STANDARD EDITION.

Bound in Rich English Cloth, beveled edges, and put up in Neat Box, six vols. Price, per set, $3.60.

The former bindings "The People's Edition" may also be had. Cloth, neat gold and ink dies, 60 cents per vol. Cheap edition in paper cover, 30 cents per volume.

...is beautiful New Wall Roll of Scripture Texts is commended for use in Homes, Hospitals, Halls, Sunday-school Rooms and other places where striking Scripture Texts arranged with much careful thought, are apt to give comfort, or awaken interest in sacred truth. Particular attention is called to the arrangement of the texts and to the very clear type in which they are printed. Size of sheet, 14x20. Can be read from opposite side of a large room.

Er. T. S. RUBEY, Secretary Mo. State S. S. Association, says: "I must thank you, and I do so over and over each day, as I look up from my desk to the precious words of God on the Wall Roll. I had known of Wall Rolls before, but never had one and knew not the real comfort to be enjoyed in using one. It is a grand treasure. I am going to put one in every home I can, for I know I shall thereby be doing a good that may tell for eternity.
